But the days and months and years passed, and he did not appear. One by one the apostles "fell asleep," but still the Christ delayed his coming. And then some began to ask, Was he the Messiah after all? Pathetic in the extreme was the condition of many a soul with the "will to believe" in those days. Messiah's failure to appear was for this first generation the great stumbling-block of faith; and what passionate prayers must have risen to heaven ere the bitter truth was realised and the belief in his immediate coming died away!

And how, as this belief died, did faith in Christ again revive? It did so after the same manner as before: by a renewed sense of his moral and spiritual greatness. His spirit had begun to pervade the cities of the Mediterranean even as, for the first disciples, it had pervaded the towns and villages of Galilee; it had entered into men's souls and into their institutions and customs, consecrating all alike to its purposes; it was asserting itself as the chief factor in the moral progress and social amelioration of humanity; and was it not, therefore, in very truth vindicating the claim of Jesus to be the Messiah and already establishing the kingdom of righteousuess and peace and joy on the earth? This resurrection of faith gave rise to a new Christology, for the materials of which the Church was indebted more to Greek metaphysics than to Jewish thought and scripture. Belief in the deity of Christ became the form of orthodox faith, and has been so ever since.

Is this form destined also to perish like its predecessors? For many it has already done so, whilst the minds of others are clouded with a doubt. Yet the Christian consciousness—which is but the extension over the world and into our own time of that profound impression which Jesus made on a few Galilean peasants—is even now originating a new and better Christology and even at the tomb in which Science and Criticism have buried the Christ of the older faith, we hear it whispered, "He is not here; he is risen."

OBITUARY.

WILLIAM BLAKE.

Alexander Pope has been twitted on the flatness of an oft-quoted line of his—"An honest man's the noblest work of God." When one has passed away to whom this simply great description seems fitting, two thoughts may come to those who knew him intimately, and to those who knew him less familiarly: there is no nobler human being than one who can be truly qualified as honest; and, this character is indeed the "work of God," for it grows to perfection not from human action or motive alone, but must have in it that living seed of religious feeling which, as we know not whence it comes, we may well refer to the grace of God.

Mr. William Blake, of Bridge, Somerset, was born 1815 in the "Old House" at Crewkerne, where his father and grandfather, whose names he bore, were in succession, for just seventy years, ministers of the Presbyterian congregation. The family tree was rich in clerical fruits. The Rev. Malachi Blake, grandfather of the first William Blake, of Crewkerne, was minister at Wellington, Somerset, at the end of the seventeenth century, and is said to have been concerned in that just and necessary—but unwise—"Rising of the West," from which, Macaulay tells us, all people who had anything but their lives to lose kept away. His concern was, perhaps, chiefly sympathetic: proof being that he died about 1706 in his bed. We may quote stemmata quid faciunt? (What are pedigrees good for?) and even maintain that descendants of truly great men are usually marked by undoubted descent. Yet we may value ties of blood that connect a family of cultivated, public-spirited English citizens with the great Admiral of whom Lord Clarendon—no partial witness, surely!—says:—"Though he hath been very well imitated and followed, he was the first that drew the copy of naval courage and bold and resolute achievements."

Born 1815, but a few years after the free and rational views of Christianity, then nicknamed "Socinian," since labelled "Unitarian," ceased to be punishable by law as blasphemy, the late Mr. Blake's life marks a long step taken since 1800 by religious equality. Living as a country gentleman, he was made Justice of the Peace for his county, Somerset, 1841, Deputy-Lieutenant some twenty years later, and pricked for High Sheriff in 1869. Not in his boyhood did sons of old Presbyterian families frequent public schools. He attended first a dame-school at Crewkerne, then a boarding-school at Taunton, and "completed his education" at York as one of the last lay-students, under three tutors whom no English University had hall-marked. His college name, "the admiral," and many scraps of memory were picked up by his successor; as of a kindly, gentle-mannered youth, not aggressive or prominent, staunch and steady, but not remarkably studious, as those who knew him in later life would expect. He was married in 1844 to Fanny, eldest daughter of William Browne, of Bridgewater, merchant, and some years after built the house of Bridge, in which he peacefully slept away on Monday, April 1.

A staunch Liberal in a Tory atmosphere; a steady Nonconformist amid "church" surroundings; on friendly terms with his neighbours, of every religious form or political tint, he was accepted with quiet respect as one impossible to change. He never pushed his Liberalism or Nonconformity so as to shock or hurt others, never asserting his opinions save where truth and consistency demanded, and then immovable. In 1881 a contested election for West Somerset came sooner than was looked for, while he was abroad with his family. Leaving them in North Italy, he came home to vote for the Liberal candidate.

A quietly active magistrate, always reliable and never officious, it was the worthy testimony, not of an enemy—for he had none—but of those, his colleagues, who looked at the duties of the "Great Unpaid" less from the standpoint of "Justice" (to all men) than of "Peace" (their own), that "there was never any getting Mr. Blake to send a poacher to prison."

He worshipped while in health, statedly with his family, at Ilminster, where the chapel is beautified by a memorial window, to his eldest child who alone of nine children died before her parents. Other Somersetshire congregations, as Crewkerne and Yeovil, have had generous aid and support from him. In the schools and all useful and benevolent work for the country-side he took a warm interest. Hospitable he was, but free from all ostentation.

Like Chaucer's Knight, "His horse (s) were good, but they were no wise gay." Self-possessed and simple in manner, dealing to his dependants an unfailing courtesy that held within it a calm conviction that his will was never likely to be disobeyed, to me he always seemed the type of a natural aristocrat, called, that is, in a limited sphere to rule, and ruling therein by the grace of God—a class which not the most utter Democrat would ever wish abolished. Let us not mourn over the death of a good man, gathered now into the Harvest of God in his season, but rejoice and be thankful that he was given to us so long.

A FRIENDLY MESSAGE.

Sir,—An old Anglican clergyman, little younger than my brother T. H. G., who is well known to you, I shall be glad to be permitted to express the pleasure and profit, intellectual and spiritual, afforded me in the pages of The Inquirer.

I derive a good intellectual bracing from your able metaphysical contributors, many of whom are pupils worthy of their great teacher, the unrivalled and incomparable Martineau, and I recognise with admiration the truly Christian spirit which appeals to me as of the essence of Christianity pervading The Inquirer, nor least its Editorial columns.

I concur with you in your opinion of the Society of Friends. Their doctrine and practice appear to me to be nearer to the religion of Jesus than those of any of the great Churches of the world, and I have never felt this more strongly than during the dreadful war, with its enormous expenditure of blood and treasure, and its long train of miseries and sufferings—past, present, and, I fear, to come.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

"And by chance there came down a certain priest that way."—St. Luke x. 31.

Many hundred years ago a loosely-robed and girdled priest was travelling along the road from Jerusalem to Jericho, possibly on his way from the temple on Mount Moriah to take part in the ritual of the synagogue in the City of Palms, as Jericho was named from its mild climate and rich soil. As he started upon the journey he had probably so often taken before, through the rocky gorge in which lay the dangerous highway connecting the two Judean cities, how little he thought that before he came within sight of the walls of Jericho, "by chance," so suddenly and so unexpectedly, it would be in his power to bring so much comfort and help to the poor traveller who "fell among thieves, which stripped him of his raiment, and wounded him"; that, "by chance," he would be able upon his accustomed journey even to save the life of the man left by the roadside "half dead."

You know how he used this great opportunity.

Whether from fear of the robbers who might be hiding in one of the rocky caves not far from the road, or from other selfish reasons, the priest "passed by on the other side."

"And by chance there came down a certain priest that way." How many things come to us "by chance," as we say. Something that we have wished for very much, but that we scarcely thought would ever happen, comes to us one day suddenly, when we are not thinking of it; we say it came "by chance." Or some illness attacks us when we had been feeling strong and well; there seemed no cause for it; "by chance" it came, we say.

If, whatever comes to us, the more we try to feel sure that God sends it, because He knows what is best for us, the happier we shall be.

And "by chance," as we call it, opportunities come into all our lives, from time to time, of doing some good to those about us; of adding, in however small a degree, to the happiness of the world; of lessening, however little, the suffering and the sadness.

Yes, these chances come into every life, some time or other; but how often, like the priest of olden time, we pass by on the other side!

But you are thinking that none of these unexpected opportunities will come into your lives; one day is so like another, it does not seem likely that any special chance will come to you of adding to the happiness of the world, or of lessening the sorrow there is in it.

When the sun is sinking in the West, and the day is done, can you not recall that "by chance" its hours have sometimes brought you an opportunity—it may have seemed a very small one—of denying yourself pleasure, time, or possessions, in order that you might make someone happier?

A companion, perhaps, or possibly a stranger to you, has been made richer that day by your kindness or help; or poorer, because, when you might have done good to your neighbour, you "passed by on the other side." Then "by chance," how soon or how suddenly you do not know, as great an opportunity may come to you as came that day so long ago, in Palestine, to the Jewish priest.

The boy walking along the quay in one of our large seaports, watching all the busy work going on there of loading and unloading vessels, amusing himself by looking on to the decks of ships from foreign parts, or listening to the sailors talking together in another language, suddenly hears a cry that a child has fallen into the water! He can swim a little, but the deep dock looks dark and dangerous; he has no time to think much, he throws off his coat, and jumps in, reaches the child, and keeps it up until more help comes. The boy never thought as he set off on his walk that before he returned home it would have been in his power to save a life!

Suddenly, and "by chance," the great opportunity came to him, and how nobly he used it! when it would have been so much easier to have "passed by on the other side."

It is most likely to be those of us who have not "passed by" the smaller chances of making someone happier which come into the common round of life, and which, if rightly used, so much enrich that common round, who will be found ready when a great opportunity of doing some noble thing comes. The great and good St. Francis, the saint whom for more than six centuries men have reverenced on account of his holy and beautiful life, if "by chance" he saw a worm upon the path in danger of being crushed stopped on his way to move it into a safe place.

Now, what do you think will help us to use rightly both the small and great opportunities of doing good to our neighbour, which may come into any day or any hour of our lives?

What will help us in our chances of doing good to those about us, to be like the Good Samaritan who "had compassion on him" "that fell among thieves"?

Most surely the keeping before us in the common round of daily life, as our pattern and guide, Jesus of Nazareth, who, whether in quiet Galilean villages, on the shores of the lake, or in the busy cities of Judea, "went about doing good." So shall these chances of doing good to our neighbour, these talents delivered to us by God, not be hidden, but yield abundant increase in the happiness of all those about us.

Every inmost aspiration
Is God's angel undefiled;
And in every "Oh, my Father," Slumbers deep a "Here, my child."
—Tholuck.

There are souls to-night mourning over their circumstances and saying: "If I only could be there where he sits in his richness and abundance of machinery and opportunity, then there would be something more for my soul." The soul is taking its own judgment of its possibilities rather than taking God's judgment. It is so much nobler to say: "God set me here to be true and not false, brave and not cowardly; it must be therefore possible for me to bring out of these circumstances something that shall be real food and sustenance and means of growth for this soul which He has set here and which He has never forgotten."—Phillips Brooks.

EASTER FAITH.

To the first disciples the conviction of life beyond death was overpowering, inasmuch as to their new spiritual insight, made clear by moral ardour and supreme love, their Master was such a one as death could not hold. Read as we will the ancient narrative, as history or legend, the fact remains as the turning-point in the history of the Christian Church, that they who might have been expected to be overwhelmed in the shadow of death which had enwrapped their Master, and the desolation of their own bereavement, rose up in the strength of a new-born and unconquerable faith, a courage that would dare to the uttermost, with the light of a great joy upon their faces, eager to declare to the world that in Christ life was victorious over death, and the gates of life were open to all who in that new faith would enter in.

"If the resurrection," says Harnack in his recent lectures on What is Christianity?—"if the resurrection meant nothing but that a deceased body of flesh and blood came to life again, we should make short work of this tradition. But it is not so. The New Testament itself distinguishes between the Easter message of the empty grave and the appearances of Jesus on the one side, and the Easter faith on the other. Although the greatest value is attached to that message, we are to hold the Easter faith even in its absence. The story of Thomas is told for the exclusive purpose of impressing upon us that we must hold the Easter faith even without the Easter message : 'Blessed are they that have not seen and yet have believed.'"

Our abiding faith rests on no such insecure foundation as a miraculous appeal to the senses, the testimony of which would be always exposed to fresh doubts, and the more painfully, as the event or supposed event faded away in the distant past—it rests and can permanently rest only on the conviction of the spirit, that with God is life, and not death. Since the time of Christ one generation has followed another, and has but deepened that conviction, bearing fresh testimony to the power of his spirit, giving further insight into the meaning of that life, which we share with him, as children of God.

This is the great joy of our Easter faith, out of which come strength and inspiration into our daily lives. With God in the world, with aspiration which rises up to lay hold on the unseen things which are eternal, with the strength of Eternal Righteousness thrilling in our hearts in their humble surrender, and the deep assurance that love is of God, and God is Love, the shadows of mortality can no longer mar the rest of our souls in Him, and that fulness of joy with which we look to the heavenly life.

In our Father's house are "many mansions," but our rest is in Him, with that greater fellowship of the seen and the unseen, in which the most glorious have their place, in which Jesus is the first-born of many brethren, and everyone is there to whom we have owed most—all who have brought us any quickening of fuller knowledge, nobler loyalty or more perfect love. They are not memories of the past, they are of the household, and as we rest in the living God, are with us here, filling our life with a new richness, making us understand better the unspeakable riches of the love of God.

So in the deepest sense the solitary is set in the family, with a Divine companionship in silent commune of the spirit ; and a fuller, richer happiness is given also to the fellowship of our churches. For as our worship is in spirit and in truth, so our fellowship is with the great company of the Household of God ; even in the humblest conventicle hearts may be lifted up to vision of divinest glory, in a communion at one with the loftiest worship of the heavenly places.

This festival of Easter is therefore for the humble and despised of the earth, even more than for the great churches with their gorgeous ritual and throngs of worshippers. It is a greater gift for the lonely heretic than for any other. To him is given an unspeakable delight in the lovely ritual of the reawakened earth, so pure and beautiful that he desires no other. His heart is lifted up in worship in that greatest of all visible temples, in which the benediction is for all alike. He is at one with humanity, because he feels the thrill of life out of which humanity is born. And amid the glory of the spring-time of the year, coming in its abundance out of the fulness of the Creator's joy which cannot fail, his thought rises to a purer height, in which it is life of the spirit that he contemplates, and in which he is anew dedicated to the holiest service. Unseen of men there are those who come to him on the Mount of Transfiguration, who talk with him perchance of what he must suffer, yet of the glory of the conflict, of what he must accomplish in brave witness to truth, in passionate loyalty to right, and in the surrender of perfect love. For to him also is given, in the Master's spirit, to love even those who hate, to give himself utterly for his brethren's sake. His prayer that the Father's will may be done brings into his heart the divine peace. He is not alone, but is compassed about by the heavenly witnesses, and is sustained by the supreme Strength and Love.

There are none, even in the humblest places of service, even the most solitary and despised, to whom these greatest of gifts are not offered, to whom the supreme joy is not open, in life which is beyond the power of death.

FROM "IN MEMORIAM."

Dear friend, far off, my lost desire,
So far, so near in woe and weal ;
O loved the most, when most I feel
There is a lower and a higher ;

Known and unknown ; human, divine ;
Sweet human hand and lips and eye ;
Dear heavenly friend that canst not die,
Mine, mine, for ever, ever mine ;

Strange friend, past, present, and to be ;
Loved deeplier, darklier, understood ;
Behold, I dream a dream of good,
And mingle all the world with thee.

Thy voice is on the rolling air ;
I hear thee where the waters run ;
Thou standest in the rising sun,
And in the setting thou art fair.

What art thou then ? I cannot guess ;
But tho' I seem in star and flower
To feel thee some diffusive power,
I do not therefore love thee less :

My love involves the love before ;
My love is vaster passion now ;
Tho' mix'd with God and Nature thou,
I seem to love thee more and more.

Far off thou art, but ever nigh ;
I have thee still, and I rejoice ;
I prosper, circled with thy voice ;
I shall not lose thee tho' I die.

"AROUND THE WINTRY TOMB."

Around the wintry tomb,
Blown by the drear wind's breath,
As with a voice of doom
The dry leaf rustleth ;
But a secret voice still whispers,
"O soul, there is no death!"

Hearts on the altar laid
May seem to perish, slain ;
The sacrificial blood
May seem to flow in vain ;
But a secret voice still whispers,
"O true soul, not in vain!"

Samuel Longfellow.

THE POWER OF HIS RESURRECTION.

St. Paul, the prisoner, as he reflects how he had suffered the loss of all things that he might gain Christ, desires that he may know him and "the power of his resurrection." Yet the thing he craves for is his already; it is the explanation of his sufferings, the very nerve of his desire.

The Resurrection of Christ is nothing if it is not a power. It is not a fact with which we have anything to do until we meet it as a power that prevails with us and works in us. It is historical fact, yet we name it so not because we find it in history, suspended and inert, but because it has made history, and is making it now. It is not quiescent fact, but fact operative and dynamic. It is ever creating the eyes that see it, and the understanding that incorporates it.

The apostle in his bonds at Rome is himself a manifestation of that power. Both his outer estate and his inner mind are testimonies of its efficacy. Imperial authority keeps him its prisoner, but only because he has succeeded in bringing every thought into a previous captivity to Christ, and counted all things to be loss for the excellency of preaching the Resurrection. Had Christ not risen there had been no bonds for Paul, his risen Lord it is who has led him into the prison-house.

But this prisoner of the Lord has power over his prison-house. Listen to his voice as it issues from those walls. Is it the sighing of a sufferer that comes out to us? Is he mourning his pitiful condition? No, he is cherishing his bonds. He numbers their excellences as though they had been set with precious stones. His fetters are become the bright tokens of the tender mercies of Christ Jesus. For have not the things which have happened unto him "fallen out unto the progress of the Gospel"? Have not his bonds been made manifest in Christ throughout the whole prætorian guard? Have they not made his brethren abundantly bold to speak? Therein he rejoices, and will have all men to rejoice with him. The apostle came not alone into his place of bondage, there entered with him an invincible agency that changed all things into its own likeness, made darkness light and weakness mastery, and set the victor's song in the breast of the captive. The doors of that house were useless when once the power of the Resurrection was suffered to pass in.

He who repeats the discovery of St. Paul is with him a witness of the Resurrection. Whoso discovers that "the things that happen" to him are thus falling out unto progress is a free man for evermore. He is lord over the world. Time and chance, joy and desolation, pain and death, are henceforth what he bids them become; he uses them for his purpose; he builds them into the fabric of his life. They are ministers whom he compels to do him service. For he has learned the superlative worth of his own spirit, how it is more than all kingdoms of the world and the glory of them.

But none can be told that secret who have not first been taught another. We cannot behold our worth until we have looked upon our worthlessness and in the cruel vision of that self-knowledge have died to all our satisfactions and been buried with the last of our conceits. When first the Christ confronts us we know him not as a deliverer. He is the breaker of our peace, he pierces us with arrows, he brings night and tempest upon us. He kindles into life our inanimate image of Deity, but it is by giving us the sense of a God whose countenance is turned away, whose eyes are purer than to behold us as we are.

Nevertheless, he who brings the night has thereby made possible the day. He has prepared our eyes in the one way that enables them to receive unblinded the Beatific Vision. The Light shineth in darkness, but only at its deepest may the darkness comprehend it. The love of God were nothing to us if we deserved that love. It is the knowledge that we are superlatively unworthy of it and yet are become its recipients that makes its amazing preciousness and establishes its sovereign efficacy. This is the grace of Christ whereby we know that while we are yet sinners God loves us. By descent into the valley of Humiliation we gauge the true height of the Delectable Mountains. We fall to rise. We are stripped of all things that we may inherit the earth. Whoso knows himself a being without deserts and yet beloved of God finds a new worth in himself, and discovers the greatness of his own spirit. Herein lies the conviction that we are more than conquerors, that the world is our servant and Time our henchman, and all the spaces of Experience, whether of things present or of things to come, are our dominion.

There is a self-esteem which is of nature and we have crucified it with Christ; there is also a self-esteem which is spiritual and with him it is risen from the dead. It was sown in dishonour; it is raised in glory. It was sown in weakness; it is raised in power. Our first confidence is of the earth, earthy; our second is the Lord from heaven. Ambrose Bennett.

SPRING HAS COME.

Lo, the winter is past;
The flowers appear on the earth;
The time of the singing of birds is come.

Spring has come with its bright sunshine and glorious changing skies. The daffodil and the coltsfoot and the primrose reflect in various shades the gold which the sun showers down upon them, as though the earth lit up these little answering signals all around to show that she understood the sun's great beacon flame, and had set about her spring-time work in response to his reassuring message.

Stirring of new life awakes within us to lead us into the fresh and sunny air, to sing with the birds and frolic over heath and field and lane, to rejoice in the infinite promise, the abounding beauty and tenderness with which our Father decks the opening year. Spiritual influences speak to us in the voice of spring: quickened sense of love responds to the loveliness of the world.

If we can find delight in Nature, untainted by our selfishness, and can glory in her wide expanse of fertile field and hill without any desire to fence it in for our own exclusive use; if we feel a quickened beating of the heart as we watch the daffodils in the wind, or the violets and primroses mingled in the hedges and banks without wanting to destroy them; if we love the song of the lark and blackbird, so that we should find it impossible to cage them; if we enter into the life of the world and let Nature tell us her story in her own way; then it is wonderful that the more we love her the less do we cling to that phase of life of which she is a part. The more deeply and unselfishly we feel and love the beauty of the natural world with keenness of delight in its wayside flowers and sunlit clouds, its verdant prospects and moorland expanses, the more likely shall we be if no harshness of dogma or life has dimmed our natural vision, to resign this world and its interests and with them give ourselves into the care of our Father whose beauty we have seen in them. If our love of the world is such that we would not destroy any of its loveliness for the sake of our own pomp or individual prosperity, but desire thankfully to share its blessings and hide none of them from another, then this real, deep love of Nature, or, if we know its real meaning, love of God in Nature, is so great that we shall know that all that is best in it will be eternally ours, that though we die and the sleep receive us, we "shall sleep into everlasting waking"; though we leave the world and its wonderful beauty all will be always ours, if God but look upon us.

If it be a childish fancy that God looks up at us from the primrose and down upon us from the stars, that He has planted and watered, and matured the daffodils and the daisies, it is one of those fancies that belongs to the childlikeness which must be the way of life of those who can see the kingdom of heaven. There is a truth in the thought that cannot be expressed adequately, and which is often best indicated by the language of little children. For God fills earth and sky with His presence and crowns the year with His goodness. He is the life of the world, but He is more than this; and finding Him in the earth in unutterable beauty we shall love it with a more tender love that feels the charm of every woodland tree and simple wild flower, and finds in the freshness of the growing grass glistening in the sun a living delight; but at the same time makes us cease to fear death and parting from these things of loveliness and grace, since it helps us to know the Father who is ours in life and in death, the living God whose children we cannot cease to be.

At Easter we celebrate not alone the Festival of Spring in sympathy with the best meaning of the early dwellers in our land, but also the new life that was in Jesus; the old time Festival of Flowers and Budding Life in Nature which has sprung forth from the darkness and apparent deadness of winter, and the new life of sonship to God which, in Jesus, showed itself in completest grace, after the darkness of Gethsemane and Calvary. God who crowned the year with His goodness crowned man with divinity. Man is divine.

How a stranger to the wonders of Nature—one coming from a dark and flowerless prison in a desert—brought to a first sight of spring and its wonders, would watch the growing plant with awful interest—watch the first green shoot pierce the soil, the dividing and the opening leaves stretching upward toward the sun! "What is its meaning?" Would it not be a great revelation when leaves spread and buds appeared, and then the bud opened and the flower came forth in all its fragrance and grace?

From this thought we may gain some faint idea of what might be the rapture of some angelic being watching the race of men unfolding and spreading over the green earth, when, at last, in its season, a full and perfect flower revealed the nature of the human creation, and, like the golden flowers of early spring, gave back a light of glory and love answering to the glory and love of God which had shone upon it, and had been the source of its life from the first. Well might such an angelic being join with the whole choir of the heavenly hosts in a song of thanksgiving and praise: "Glory to God in the Highest," "Humanity has blossomed: how beautiful the flower!" Priestley Prime.

THE NEW ENGLAND DAUGHTER.

Silent at the post of service
Till from out her guarding hands
Goes the last intrusted dear one,
The New England daughter stands.
Ask not who will teach her courage
Or the gathering shades dispel?
Ask not who her age will lighten?
She has done her duty well.

Sons there are, whose rising fortunes
In the newer West shine fair:
They have left the father, mother,
To the daughter's tender care.
Love has passed her by unburdened,
Prizes she has put aside;
But the old home voices call her
With a summons ne'er denied.

When the filial tasks are ended,
There may be a place for her.
Ah, the still New England homesteads
That one lonely life inter!
She will tend her flowers in summer;
And, when winter days are drear,
In the north wind's noisy tumult
Ghostly voices she will hear.

Up and down the quiet valleys,
On the hillsides, by the sea,
Nestling 'neath the village shade-trees,
Wait these homes for you and me.
We can see them as we journey,
In the darkness gleams their light;
And we know of life's lone triumph
As we fare on through the night.

Edward F. Hayward.

In the Christian Register.

When Peter, the impetuous and demonstrative, who could not bear Christ to doubt the sincerity of his affection, cried, in answer to the question that seemed almost cruel, "Lord, Thou knowest all things, Thou knowest that I love Thee," Christ's reply was no assurance of trust and sympathy such as Peter's heart must have longed for, but the laconic, bare command, "Feed my sheep." That conversation between Christ and Peter epitomised the epistle of St. James. It dealt once for all with the fallacy—the plea of cowardice, that because we do not feel great, beautiful emotions when we like, we cannot do right and serve God. It made love primarily motive force. If the one way toward Pentecost were a way of vivid, fiery enthusiasm, many people would have a right to say that the quest was hopeless. But there is another way, the way of enthusiasm not vivid, yet dynamic, and it is a way that all can tread, fulfilling in hours of gloom, as Arnold says, tasks willed in hours of insight—on to the clearer revelation and the deeper love.—May Kendall, in "Present Day Papers."

IS NATURE CRUEL?

Sir,—Will you allow me to remind your other correspondents under this heading that my contention was that "Nature"—in the ordinary sense of that term—was not cruel. Whether man be so or not, either as a flesh-eater or in other respects, is quite another question. I therefore do not feel called upon to discuss that issue, though I should certainly not deny that cruelty, as a human vice, is still but too common. Yet it is far less so than in former times; indeed, the tendency of the present age seems to be rather to an almost morbid shrinking from the idea of physical pain. E. G. Bayle-Bernard.

CHRISTIANITY, THE RELIGION OF THE INCARNATION.

Sir,—If this correspondence had for its raison d'être merely a difference of opinion between Mr. Lloyd and myself as to whether a certain use of a certain term is legitimate or not, I should be willing enough to let the matter rest where it is—even though Mr. Lloyd in his last letter has resort to a violent travesty of my position; the letter, considered as a controversial device, will probably defeat its own end.

Again, so far as this discussion illustrates once more the age-old struggle between the letter and the spirit, its significance will not be lost upon readers of The Inquirer, who know which killeth, and which giveth life.

But, unless I am much mistaken, what prompts Mr. Lloyd's persistent objection to my use of the term "Incarnation" in a sense which has the authority of Dr. Martineau, and which I believe is becoming more and more general, is something quite other than mere philological purism; what seems to offend him is not so much the word under discussion as the attitude towards Jesus which that word implies. I suggest that this is the real issue, and I am firmly convinced that it is of vital importance to our churches that it should be fully understood. In other words, I venture to think that what our churches have most severely suffered from is just the lack of this vivifying conception of the Incarnation—that for all our oft-expressed belief in "the humanity of God and the divinity of man," we have largely failed to perceive that Christ himself is the supreme proof and type of both; and herein lies—again to my thinking—the secret of our scant success.

May I explain this yet a little farther? There has been a tendency in Unitarian thought to make Christ no more than a great ethical and spiritual teacher—not the supreme Revelation and Revealer of God; the comparative disesteem in which the Fourth Gospel has been held in our ranks—and which, I believe, Dr. Martineau deeply regretted—bears testimony to this. There has been a tendency to imagine that on the whole we might come to God as well apart from, as through Christ. This refusal of a divinely proffered means of access—through a unique Personality in whom the divine and human elements are perfectly mingled—could not but bring about its proper calamitous consequences: "as the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine; so neither can ye, except ye abide in me." If our movement, in spite of scholarship and criticism, in spite of the high ethical standard of so many of its leaders and those who compose its rank and file alike, has on the whole been so little fruitful—if we are lacking in contagious fervour and irresistible enthusiasm—need we seek farther for the cause of phenomena patent to most onlookers? Ubi Christus, ibi Ecclesia; there can be no living Church apart from the living Christ, the Incarnate Son of God, "for through him we have our access in one Spirit unto the Father."

BIRMINGHAM UNITARIAN TWENTIETH CENTURY CELEBRATION.

On Friday evening, March 29, the Unitarians of Birmingham celebrated the opening of the twentieth century by a social gathering in the Town Hall. Notwithstanding the unsettled state of the weather, there was an attendance of about 700 or 800 people. The floor of the hall was to a large extent cleared of the seats, and was used as a reception-room.

A musical programme, which included part-songs by a choir drawn from the various churches, occupied part of the evening.

At 9 o'clock there was a pause for the delivery of short speeches. Lieut.-General Phelps presided, and among those present were the Revs. R. A. Armstrong (Liverpool), A. N. Blatchford (Bristol), J. Wood, L. P. Jacks, A. A. Charlesworth, A. Ryland (hon. secretary), J. C. Street, J. B. Higham, and W. J. Clarke; Messrs. J. Arthur Kenrick, Charles Harding, Priestley Smith, T. H. Russell, W. J. Cross, P. W. Crosskey, C. Crosskey, Herbert New (treasurer), Geoffrey New, Allen Edwards, W. J. B. Tranter, T. K. Scruton, H. Payton, E. Taylor, J. H. Forrester, S. S. Woollaston, R. H. Parry, H. E. Perry, R. H. Armstrong, and W. Unite. A letter of apology was read from the Right Hon. William Kenrick.

The Chairman said that it was a great occasion, and none of them would see it again. To him the contrast between the years 1801 and 1901 was an extraordinary one. In Birmingham a hundred years ago there was violent discord, and chapels were burnt. The most illustrious minister they ever had—Priestley—had his library burnt and was himself obliged to live in exile in America. A hundred years ago it was a great risk to acknowledge oneself a Unitarian, but since then great changes have taken place. It is true that they were denied the Christian name and Christian fellowship, but that was really only a ceremonial survival and did not amount to much. It would probably dawn upon those who used that method of exclusion that to pronounce Unitarians non-Christians, was to impeach their own Christianity. But speaking apart, he said, toleration, friendship and harmony are enormously developed since 1801.

The Rev. R. A. Armstrong, B.A., delivered an address on "The Theology of the Twentieth Century." He said that owing to the short space of time allotted to him he could give but a sketchy description of that great topic. It seemed to him that the theologians of the present time can for the most part be ranged or divided into four parties. The most prominent and perhaps the most characteristic of these during the latter years of the nineteenth century was the great sacramentarian party, who would once more bring the religious thought of England under the sway of the priests, and which exercised its functions through the sacrament. It was a remarkable characteristic of the times that that view of religion had become so widely prevalent, and had attracted so large a proportion of our people. That great and noble Englishman, who lived for so long a time in Birmingham—Cardinal Newman—was the head of the sacramentarian movement in England. Cardinal Newman held that all material and outward things were comparatively unreal, and the only realities were God and the soul. Sacramentarianism was to Cardinal Newman the only expression of spiritual life. The speaker commented, however, that the Ritualistic movement of the present time was exactly the opposite of Newman's. We had in the second group, he said, a somewhat provoking school of what he might call orthodox Liberalism, especially amongst the great Nonconformist bodies—a school which endeavoured to preserve as far as possible the language of the old doctrines, while framing the doctrines to fit the thought and the knowledge of the present time. The third school was that which called itself agnostic, the prince of which was that noble man, whose life and letters are now known to so many of us—Thomas Henry Huxley. In him the confession of ignorance concerning divine things reached its noblest and its best. They saw in him the passionate love of truth, the passionate desire to know, and the passionate determination to be true, and never to profess to know unless he really did know, which formed the backbone of manly character. In the fourth party they had what they might draw together under the name of Unitarians. If he had anything to say of that school it was that some of them failed to recognise the full depth of the religious problem. In considering which of those was likely to prevail in "the little moment of time carved out of vast eternity, and called the nineteenth century," he said the result depended mainly upon the moral fibre of the English people. If on the one hand England was going to be full of the spirit of materialism, the love of military glitter, and an indifference to the highest aspirations which could occupy the human mind and soul, then he believed there would be a triumph of those sects of the comparatively orthodox variety—of the half-hearted sacramentarianism of the Ritualists, and the half-hearted liberality of the orthodox Nonconformist, with among the best minds a great impetus to agnosticism, and that the Unitarian form of religion would be for a time in abeyance. If, on the other hand, love of justice rises to full strength, and might, and power, in the breasts of Englishmen, if the voice of humanity be heard above every other voice in the land, if there be a general recognition of the higher elements of life, and the aspirations of all, then he believed there was a great and glorious future for a large, wide, pure, generous theism such as that which characterised their own churches at the present time.

The Rev. A. N. Blatchford, B.A., then delivered a short address on "The Religion of the Twentieth Century." He said that he had apparently been asked to fulfil the rôle of the prophet, but he did not think that the mantle of the Prophet Jeremiah had fallen on his shoulders. In any forecast of the religion and religious life of the future, he thought that they were encouraged to take a hopeful view by the signs which they are privileged to read of the religious life, of the social life, and of the national life of our country during the century that has passed. He did not think that he could do better than consider what the progress of religion has been under the reign of that ever-beloved Sovereign, who will be remembered not so much as a monarch but as a patron saint, Queen Victoria. The speaker thought that the example she set and the influence she exercised, by which she touched the hearts of thousands, was an influence which bore closely upon the development of the religion of to-day, and also in the coming time. He was, he said, pleased to give a definition of religion from one who is known and respected as the Archdeacon of Manchester, Mr. Wilson. He well remembered hearing that gentleman tell a class that "Religion consists in caring much, and caring always for doing your duty." The speaker ventured to base his forecast of the religion of the coming century upon that statement. With matters that are connected with practical life, he was glad to see the fellowship the laymen of all churches show in relieving the troubles that press so heavily on humanity at the present time. He also commended those men who apply themselves to the practical redemption of the world of sin. Referring to the war between the Northern and Southern States of the United States of America, and how feeling ran high at that time, the speaker related a somewhat touching incident. A corps of either side found themselves marching in the same direction on different banks of the river. In the evening while encamped opposite each other, the sounds of music were wafted across the river from the Southern tents, to the strains of a well-known Southern war song. The Northern drums and trumpets replied with an equally well-known marching song, and so songs were heard until in the darkness, floating across the river from the Southern tents came that beautiful air, "Home, sweet home." There was no reply, for, said a Northern officer, we did not feel like fighting after that. In conclusion, the speaker said that he was hopeful for the future, for he had confidence in the soundness and sanity of the moral heart of the nation, and that in the saving of humanity there would be the triumph of the religion of the twentieth century.

The Rev. Joseph Wood proposed a vote of thanks to the chairman and speakers, and this was seconded by the Rev. L. P. Jacks. The musical programme was afterwards resumed.

UNITED SUNDAY SERVICE.

The celebration was continued on Sunday evening by a United Service in the Town Hall. All the Unitarian places of worship were closed for the occasion, and members of the various congregations were admitted to the Hall by ticket, and doors were thrown open to the general public at 6.15. The Hall was well filled in every part (orchestra excepted), and about 2,000 persons were present. The service was conducted by the Revs. L. P. Jacks, Joseph Wood, and A. A. Charlesworth, the lesson being taken from the third chapter of Philippians. Hymns were sung to well-known tunes, and two anthems were sung by the same choir that gave their services on the previous Friday. Mr. Cotton (Old Meeting) presided at the organ, and Mr. Halliby (Church of the Messiah) conducted.

The sermon was preached by the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke, and is likely, we understand, to be published separately. A brief summary appeared in the Birmingham Daily Post, to which we are indebted for the following notes:—We look forward, Mr. Brook said, on the threshold of an unknown century, and strive to imagine what it will be for our nation and mankind. We stand like a band of colonists on the frontiers of a new land, into which we have to enter to subdue it to law and civilisation. In the desire to press on, one thing we might easily forget was the remembrance and the reverence of our own country's noble past. Unless we know what we are by descent and growth we shall not know how to act in new circumstances so as to harmonise our acts and theories with the genius of the nation. It was owing to this want of knowledge of the past, or the indifference of it, that so many new schemes of social improvement withered. We should be intelligent enough to see what was permanent in the past, and what was transient; and if some of the wise things of the past were unfitted for the present we should not fling them away carelessly, but lay them aside with gratitude and reverence, just as we wrapped up a book which we had read, loved, and assimilated. Let us respect what was valuable, retain in the memory and cherish what was true and wise, and decline the transitory and false. Let us think of the great deeds and noble qualities displayed by our ancestors. That was the kernel of the matter to know the high moral qualities of those who lived before us, their self-sacrifice, justice, and true honest worth, their unfailing courage and hope in difficulty, and their perseverance in the pursuit of national good and freedom. To know and love these things, to give them admiration and reverence—there was nothing of greater power than that to form and develop a man into noble citizenship in the present and for the future. We see as we look upon the great doings and lives of the past that mere wealth and luxury, big commerce and great possessions, cleverness in getting the better of our rivals, haughty isolation from other nations, are not, as so many think, the greatness of a nation, but its decay and its corruption. Let us, therefore, resolve to stand fast in our private life, and in our lives as citizens against this false conception of greatness—cherishing and practising the faith that our greatness of soul and the greatness of England abides and is secure not in these outward things, but in the character of God Himself, living and abiding in the character of our people. Think not of the wars and treaties, but of the history of the battle of the people for a just and noble freedom, for liberty of opinion, of representation, of religion, of individual development which had never ceased to make its way, and which still pressed on to its final goal. And then draw from our knowledge of it, and apply it for the benefit of our fellows. He desired that reverence for the past should be part of the temper of the soul, but not such reverence as retained in it that which neither suited the present nor served the interest of the future. A mighty movement which would deeply engage the whole politics of this country was rising slowly into increasing force towards the saving of men from preventible misery and moral evil, and in this it was our duty to prepare ourselves to take a practical part.

The sermon concluded with an aspiration after simplicity of life, plain living and high thinking, which are at the root of national greatness and private greatness of character.

LEICESTER FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

OPENING CEREMONY.

The building scheme which was the outcome of a desire on the part of this congregation to promote their work in a more populous part of the town was brought to a successful issue on Thursday, March 28, when the new church was opened under most favourable auspices.

It may be remembered that the schoolroom was opened in January of last year, and the memorial-stone of the church was laid by Sir J. T. Brunner, Bart., in the following July. The two buildings have been most skilfully designed to harmonise in the view from Narborough-road, the architecture of the school being of a more domestic character, while the church is modified Gothic.

The church is entered by a spacious vestibule, and there are two aisles, designed only to be used as passages and not for seating; these aisles are divided from the nave of the church by a series of columns supporting arches, above which are clerestory windows. The chancel is occupied by carved oak stalls for the choir, and on one side of it is the minister's vestry and on the other an organ chamber. The stained window in the chancel, representing the return of the Prodigal Son, is erected to the memory of the late Thomas Chattaway, a member of the church from its foundation, by his widow and family. It is the work of the Morris Company. The pulpit, of Burmantoft's terra-cotta, is the generous gift of Mr. Charles Kempson, A.R.I.B.A., honorary architect of the buildings. Two brass tablets have been presented by two members of the congregation to indicate Mr. Kempson's gift and services, and also to commemorate the opening services.

The church will accommodate 300 persons, is seated with chairs, and lighted by electricity.

The church was opened by Mrs. T. Fielding Johnson, in the presence of a large congregation. Speaking from the chancel, Mrs. Johnson pronounced the following words:—"I declare this building now open for the worship of Almighty God, and I pray that His blessing, and the inspiration of His well-beloved Son, our Master Jesus Christ, may descend and ever more rest upon its ministers and people, guiding and illuminating their search after the Higher Life, stimulating their efforts for the spread of Eternal Truth and Righteousness, and filling their hearts with love and zeal for the service of God and man."

The dedicatory service followed immediately, conducted by the Revs. C. Hargrove, H. Gow, J. M. Lloyd Thomas, and W. Whitaker. The sermon was preached by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, of Liverpool.

The sermon was founded upon the Psalmist's words, "Send out thy light and thy truth." It was a timely plea for thoroughness and frankness in the holding of truth and in the profession of it. Indifferentism, and the various pretexts upon which an easy-going tolerance is defended, were made the subject of an eloquent protest. It was shown that the great achievements of the moral and religious spirit had been won by men of deep convictions. If men were uncertain about religious truth, of course they could not proclaim it. But the convinced were inexcusable if they remained silent. The common objection to the fervid proselytiser was really based not upon doubts as to the duty of seeking converts, but upon the mistakes of temper and feeling which so frequently spoilt controversy. This church was dedicated to Truth.

In the evening a public meeting was held in the schoolroom. The chair was taken by Mr. C. H. Roberts, who gave an account of the efforts which had led up to the present occasion. The Rev. W. Agar, formerly minister of the church, was warmly received by his old friends, and referred to former experiences there. Stirring addresses were delivered by the Revs. R. A. Armstrong and C. Hargrove. The minister of the congregation (the Rev. W. Whitaker) moved, and Mr. W. Simpson, of the Great Meeting, seconded, a vote of thanks to Mr. Armstrong and Mr. Hargrove, and this was supported by the Rev. J. M. Ll. Thomas, of Nottingham.

The opening services were continued on Sunday, when the Rev. J. Page Hopps preached morning and evening to crowded congregations. In the morning there were not sufficient seats, notwithstanding the addition of some 150 chairs, whilst at the evening service every standing space was occupied, and large numbers were unable to gain admission.

In the morning the Great Meeting most generously closed their chapel in order to assist the movement.

In the afternoon a Young People's Service was held, when Miss Edith Gittins gave an address.

The collections on the opening day and the following Sunday amounted to £48, in addition to which donations were promised to the amount of £112. This leaves about £1,200 still required to meet the cost of the entire scheme, and the Committee urgently appeal for the further sympathy and support of all Unitarians and liberal Christians.

On Monday evening the President and Mrs. C. H. Roberts held a conversazione in the school-room, to which a large number of friends were invited. During the evening a presentation of an illuminated address was made to Mr. Kempson, in recognition of his most valuable services.

The opening services will be continued on Easter Sunday, when the Rev. Dr. G. D. Hicks, M.A., will preach.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

NORTH MIDLAND DISTRICT.

There are many signs of promise and of growth in the North Midland District at the present time. The most cheering event that has taken place has been the opening of the Free Christian Church at Narborough-road, Leicester. It was a great occasion—a new and important development in the history of liberal Nonconformity in Leicester—and all who were present at the opening services must have felt cheered and strengthened by them. It was a great thing to have Mr. Armstrong as preacher, and merely to see him looking so well and so full of noble power was something to rejoice and inspirit all the congregation. For those who have known and looked up to him for years as a leader and a friend, his presence and the tones of his voice were a benediction to the place, and gave to the new building a sense of home and peace. In the evening there was a large and enthusiastic public meeting. The speeches of Mr. Agar, the former minister, and Mr. Whitaker, the present minister, were particularly impressive and beautiful. Mr. Agar spoke of the history and hard struggles of the past, and rightly insisted that much of the success to-day was due to the quiet earnest work under great difficulties of minister and congregation in former days. Mr. Whitaker spoke of the conduct of the work, the unfailing energy and perfect harmony of the congregation, and especially dwelt upon the responsibilities that were now laid on him and them. They had a beautiful church and school in a growing district: the instruments needful for a large good work had been placed in their hands, and it rested with them to use them to the uttermost. Every one who heard Mr. Whitaker's speech and who knows something of the spirit of the congregation must look forward to the future of this church with strong hope and confidence. It has a great opportunity of doing good, and I believe that opportunity will be eagerly accepted.

This letter is written, owing to editorial demands, before the opening Sunday services, to be conducted by the Rev. J. Page Hopps. It is a fortunate circumstance for the Free Christian Church to have obtained the services of so popular and able a preacher. On hearing that Mr. Hopps was coming, the Great Meeting Vestry decided to close their chapel in the morning as a mark of respect to their former minister and of good wishes to the new church.

Another development which will have a more general effect upon the district at large is that a decision has been just taken to appoint a district missionary. His special work will be the supervision of the congregations at Ilkeston and Burton, and the organising of the lay-preaching power of the district. The High Pavement and Great Meeting congregations have each promised £50 a year for three years towards the salary of such a minister, and help, amounting to £26, has been promised from other friends in the district. It may be remembered that a few years ago this scheme was strongly urged upon us by Dr. Brooke Herford and Mr. Bowie. At that time it was found impossible to raise the money. Now, however, the money has been raised, and with comparative ease and rapidity. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association are prepared to generously assist with a grant of £100 a year, so that our financial position is secured. Negotiations are now in progress with an experienced and able minister, and it is hoped that in a few weeks an appointment may be made. When it is, there is every reason to believe that the Ilkeston and Burton congregations will be much strengthened and increased, and that some new life and work will be brought into the district.

It is also a matter for sincere satisfaction that Boston has now once again a settled minister of its own. Rather more than a year ago the chapel at Boston was re-opened by the efforts of the Central Postal Mission, at the initiative of Miss Tagart and Miss Florence Hill. The North Midland Association assisted them by granting £15 towards the expenses, and now that a minister has been found in the person of the Rev. W. Stoddart, they have made a grant at the rate of £20 a year. The report of the numbers attending services is very encouraging, and the Central Postal Mission is to be heartily congratulated on the success of its efforts.

Another cause for encouragement has been the appointment of the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas to the important congregation of the High Pavement Church, Nottingham, and the impression which he has made upon the town even during the short time of his ministry. The ministers of that congregation have almost always been men of singular power and leaders in the district. The removal of the Rev. W. E. Addis to Oxford gave us not only a sense of private but of public loss. In him Nottingham had not only a great scholar, but a deep religious influence. We are glad to feel that Mr. Thomas gives promise of being a worthy successor, and that he is already increasing and strengthening his congregation.

The Mansfield congregation also has much improved under the ministry of Mr. Fripp. It has long had the reputation of being one of the strongest and most united churches of those in the smaller towns of the district, and under Mr. Fripp's ministry it is quite certain that that reputation will be justified and increased.

Most of the other congregations in the district remain much as they were. In small towns like Belper or Newark it is hardly to be expected that striking progress will be made. But we cannot measure the good work being done, nor estimate the devotion and energy of ministers in little towns or villages by considering the progress which takes place. Mr. Wicksteed, in his Essex Hall Lecture, warned us against the modern tendency to measure everything by progress. To seek rather than to find, to press on rather than to rest, to strive rather than to enjoy, in this he sees both the strength and the weakness of modern life. We are filled with thoughts of improvement rather than with thankfulness for the blessings that we have. We think of God rather as a Nature to be discovered and understood than as a Being to be enjoyed and worshipped. That tendency is exemplified even in such a matter as the estimate of work done in small churches. It is delightful to see progress, it is good to desire it, but it is not the only standard by which the earnestness and worth of a minister or a congregation can be judged. In large towns progress ought to be expected, but in small towns it is enough to earn our respect and gratitude for the ministers if a few characters are strengthened, a few lives cheered, and if men are true under adverse conditions and persecution to the faith that is in them. Such work does not show much result, it may not show any progress, but it is work which is at least as hard and often much more trying than the work of a minister in large towns. Such work we are confident is being done in many little churches, both in this district and in all the others throughout the country.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Bolton: Bank-street and Halliwell-road.—The annual report of the congregation is an encouraging document, and shows a vigorous condition of life. The number of seatholders is 414, a gain of 118 in five years. In addition to the work at Bank-street, which has been well sustained, the new Mission at Halliwell-road has been established with remarkably satisfactory results. A report and balance-sheet of the Mission are given, and the Committee congratulate all connected with the Mission upon being able to show such satisfactory proofs of progress after their first year's work. £831 7s. 8d. was raised by the Bank-street congregation for the purchase and equipment of the premises for the Mission. The average adult attendance at the Halliwell-road Sunday evening services for the year has been 69, of scholars at the afternoon school for some time past 114. The congregational roll of subscribing members numbered 66, and after paying all working expenses, exclusive of the ministry, which is supplied from Bank-street, the Rev. E. S. Hicks, B.A., assistant minister, being in charge, a balance of £36 19s. 4d. remained, most of which has been transferred to a fund for the purchase of the ground-rent. At the annual spring soirée of Bank-street congregation, held on Tuesday, March 26, Mr. John Lawson, J.P., presided, and addresses were given by the Chairman, the Rev. M. R. Scott, of Ainsworth, and the Rev. C. J. Street, M.A., LL.B., senior minister. There was a large attendance, and a good spirit pervaded the proceedings.

Bolton District Sunday School Union.—The first quarterly meeting was held at Unity Church, Bolton, on Saturday, March 30, and was well attended by teachers and delegates of the neighbouring churches. Tea was provided at five, and afterwards a lecture was delivered by the Rev. Charles Peach, of Manchester, on "The Holiday Home at Great Hucklow, in Derbyshire." Mr. Peach dwelt upon the important work which the holiday home movement was doing by affording an opportunity to many children living in our great manufacturing centres, of enjoying some of the finest air and most beautiful country in England at a very small cost, and urged teachers to make the slight sacrifice of time that was necessary in order to give their scholars some short respite from the dust and air of city life. The lecture, which was highly interesting and instructive, was copiously illustrated by limelight views of the Hucklow district. About the conclusion of the proceedings a collection was taken on behalf of the home amounting to £2.

Bury.—The April Calendar of Bank-street Chapel contains the following note:—"Rev. Thomas Braddock's Portrait.—A very interesting memento of the first minister of Silver-street Chapel has been recently hung on the walls of the vestry. A former member of this congregation happened to discover a silhouette of Mr. Braddock in a small oval frame. This was borrowed from the owner and carefully photographed; and in order to reproduce the features of the original, Mr. J. W. Elliott has executed a fine pencil drawing enlarged from the black silhouette. The photograph and the drawing are now framed together as one picture, for which the congregation is indebted to one of the trustees. It is surprising how little is known of Mr. Braddock. He was born in 1695, and was assistant to the Rev. Edward Rothwell, the founder of the old Dundee Chapel, which was opened Aug. 5, 1712. In 1729 Silver-street Chapel was founded, and until the death of Mr. Rothwell, in 1731, there was a joint pastorate, each minister officiating alternately at Dundee and Bury. After Mr. Rothwell's death, Mr. Braddock confined his services to Bury. The inscription on his tomb in our chapel-yard is as follows:—'Here lies the remains of the Rev. Thomas Braddock, who was fifty years Minister of a dissenting congregation in this place. His faithful services are still remembered by his beloved people, and by them tho' dead he still speaketh. He dyed Novr. 13th, 1770. Aged 75.' It would be a most fortunate thing if silhouettes or portraits could be secured of Mr. Braddock's successors, Mr. Hughes and Mr. Allard; or of his colleague Mr. Rothwell. If a history of our chapel be ever written, this portrait of Mr. Braddock will naturally find a place in it."

Hale.—On Monday, March 18, the annual business meeting of the congregation was held in the larger schoolroom, the Rev. T. Robinson in the chair. The attendance, consisting of members of the congregation, and parents of Sunday scholars, was large, filling the schoolroom. The statement of the treasurer (Miss Valentine) showed a healthy state of chapel finances, with considerably increased annual subscriptions. The secretary (Mr. R. H. Wolff) gave an account of the year's work done in connection with the chapel, choir, Sunday-school, Band of Hope, evening classes, and Cricket Club, all which institutions he reported as in a healthy and flourishing condition. He said that owing to removals from the district there had been a loss of six seatholders, but, on the other hand, during the year twelve new seatholders had taken sittings, representing an addition of seventeen attendants at the services. The Sunday-school, owing to a case of fever at the schoolhouse, had been closed for eight weeks in December and January, nevertheless when reopened the school had shown not the slightest diminution in numbers or efficiency. The Band of Hope, also interfered with by the fever scare, had resumed its meetings with slightly increased membership. Altogether there existed an excellent tone and spirit of harmony on the part of those connected with the congregation and schools. The Rev. T. Robinson then gave a detailed account of a special mission he had conducted in connection with the lowest stratum of the adult village population. Early in October he had been grieved to see unattached loiterers, and yet more shocked to see young men and old turned out of the public-house at the afternoon closing time—some of them intoxicated. He had gone out repeatedly and addressed these men, and had invited them to come to him for a comfortable afternoon in the restored old schoolroom; and helped by Messrs. W. Hall (harmonium), Ed. Faulkner, and T. Clarke, he had held services, with cheerful and encouraging addresses founded on the lives of men who had raised themselves by their own efforts. These services had been held, without intermission, throughout the winter, and had been attended by just the sort of men it was desirable to win and influence—of all ages, from eighteen to sixty years. Altogether about forty men had been gathered in on different Sundays, the average attendance being slightly over eleven. Mr. Robinson spoke warmly of the difference in bearing of these men towards him as he passed to and fro in the village and received their friendly greetings, and of the inspiration the work had been to himself and his faithful coadjutors. Votes of thanks to Miss Wolff and Miss Simpson for their help with refreshments, and to Mr. Mossop (the organist) and Miss M. Nicholson for their help with the musical part of the evening, brought a very encouraging meeting to a close.

Harrogate.—A course of four lectures has just been concluded in Harrogate. The lecturers were the Revs. A. Chalmers, C. Hargrove, E. Ceredig Jones, and H. Rawlings, the subjects being "The Apostles' Creed," "What must I do to be Saved?" "The Impregnable Rock of Unitarianism," and "The Unity of God and the Unity of Mankind." The audiences were not large, but those who attended the lectures were keenly interested, and several expressed their desire for still further courses, or services. At the conclusion of the lectures by the Rev. E. C. Jones and H. Rawlings, questions were asked. On Tuesday (March 26) a hearty vote of thanks was accorded to all the ministers for their valuable and enlightening addresses, which had been most highly appreciated. The Committee of the Harrogate Free Library has kindly permitted The Inquirer to be placed weekly in the reading-room.

Hull.—The Rev. E. W. Lummis, M.A., closed his ministry of Park-street Church on Sunday last, when he preached his farewell sermon, prior to his departure for Warrington. At the conclusion of the evening service, Mr. S. Harris and Mr. W. B Holmes expressed the regret felt by all connected with the church at his removal, and their good wishes for his future career. The three years of Mr. Lummis's ministry have stimulated the church to greater earnestness and activity, and have been productive of much good work.

Kirkcaldy.—The annual soirée was held in the church on Wednesday, March 27, when the occasion was taken to present a testimonial to the Rev. A. E. Parry, on his leaving for Liscard, and as a mark of appreciation of his work in Kirkcaldy. There was a large attendance, including a number of Edinburgh friends. After tea the President took the chair, and was supported by the Revs. A. E. Parry, R. B. Drummond, B.A., Edinburgh, and J. Forrest, M.A., Glasgow. The Rev. R. B. Drummond said he wished to join in the expressions of regret he had heard from various quarters at the loss of Mr. Parry. He had known him for a long time, and knew the good work which he had done. He had, with the assistance of his congregation, made the cause respected in Kirkcaldy, and had very ably assisted in the establishing of a new church building of their own. His removal would be felt as a great loss, not only by Kirkcaldy, but by the Scottish Unitarian Church generally. The chairman paid a warm tribute to the work and influence of Mr. Parry. There was no one but was forced to admit the assistance he had given to the spread of a robust spirit in the Unitarianism of Scotland. While they all regretted his leaving, they wished him all success and happiness at Liscard, and felt sure he would continue the good work he had begun at Kirkcaldy. He closed by asking Mr. Parry to accept eighteen volumes, including the two already published of the "Encyclopædia Biblica," along with a purse of sovereigns, and a clock and ornaments for Mrs. Parry. Mr. Parry acknowledged the gifts with much feeling. It was a very painful occasion for him for many reasons, but his regrets were lessened by his conviction that the church was in as good a position as ever it had been. A pioneer church could not expect a large membership roll. The church, though small, stood for principles, which were winning their way throughout the whole world. He concluded by again thanking them for their kindness, and observed that he had an excellent curate in his wife, who desired to join him in all his expressions of gratitude. The Rev. J. Forrest also spoke, and an excellent programme of music and recitation was much enjoyed, the proceedings terminating with the singing of "Auld Lang Syne." On Sunday afternoon Mr. Parry was made the recipient of a beautiful present, consisting of eight volumes of the "Temple Classics," from the scholars of the Sunday-school.

London: Bermondsey.—A meeting of the Bermondsey congregation was held last Sunday at the close of the evening service, to take leave of Mr. E. Howard, who has finished work among them. In the course of a short address, Mr. Howard said that he did not wish the congregation, with whom for five months he had been in such sympathetic relations, to be under the impression that he had deserted his post on account of its difficulties or for any flimsy reason. When he came on Nov. 1 it had been decided to discontinue the services, and he volunteered to take charge of the work until the end of March, the London District Unitarian Society promising a grant towards the incidental expenses until that time. It was thoroughly understood that it was an experiment, and at the end of the five months' trial he was to be free to leave and the London District equally free to withdraw their aid. This, after a review of all the circumstances, and of the progress made they decided to do, and therefore by their action his tenure of office came to an end. When it was known that he was leaving, he was asked to remain on by the trustees of the chapel, and also by the London and Provincial Assembly, both of whom offered to guarantee the necessary funds to carry on the work. But under all the circumstances he did not care to reconsider his decision to go and make another start under a different organisation. In addition to this he thought that his leaving would clear the way for a larger scheme of work, impossible with the present facilities and resources. They had been disappointed in some of their efforts, but in many ways very substantial progress had been made. When he came the first evening the church was dirty and dingy; that evening it was light, warm, and comfortable to worship in. He had been told that the services were as earnest, hearty, and helpful as ever they had been. The congregation, although not large, was, he was assured, quite double what it had been recently, and with only one service on Sunday instead of two, the collections had doubled in amount in comparison with last year. The Sunday-school had largely increased in numbers as well as order and efficiency, and he had succeeded in getting a good library together of over 150 volumes of suitable books, which were greatly in demand. Mr. Harris, the superintendent of the Band of Hope, told him that they were more prosperous than for some years past. A Boys' Club had been established, and had been so successful that starting in December with six members, they had now nearly 100 names on the books, with an average attendance of sixty-five. Early in the New Year they had to refuse to admit new members, and had turned away as many as fifteen applicants for membership in one evening. He thought he might fairly say that the whole outlook was considerably brighter than it had been for some time past. To all who had done so much in the several departments in the choir, school, Band of Hope, boys' club, and church work, and especially to his friend Mr. Huxstead, who, Sundays and week-days, had never spared himself, Mr. Howard expressed his grateful thanks. Mr. Callem, in a sympathetic speech, moved a resolution of thanks to Mr. Howard for his helpful ministry, and this, after being seconded by Mr. A. H. Crocker and supported by Mr. Percy Pain and Mr. G. Osborne, was heartily carried. Mr. Howard, in responding, said that the best thanks that the congregation could render to him would be to throw themselves heartily into the church work and bring back into vigorous life a useful movement which he had done his best to save from extinction. The services during April will be conducted by Mr. R. S. Fraser, who will give addresses on "The Angel Heart of Man," "The Soul's Awakening," "Reunion in the Hereafter," and "Man's Duty Here."

London: Essex Church.—There will be service on Good Friday morning at 11, conducted by the Rev. Frank K. Freeston. On Easter Sunday evening Stainer's "Daughter of Jairus" will be given in the church.

London: Wood Green.—Members of Unity Hall figured prominently at Trinity Hall on Saturday evening last, in connection with a Welsh charity concert on behalf of the fund for the relief of the distressed women and children affected by the Penrhyn Quarry dispute. The chairman was the Rev. T. Wynne-Jones (Wesleyan), supported by our own venerable minister at Wood Green (the Rev. Dr. Mummery), Councillor Marlow Reed, and other local celebrities. The principal singers were the famous Bethesda Male Voice Choir, consisting of twenty-two quarrymen, and the concert was a great success.

Manchester: Moss Side.—A sale of work was held on Wednesday, March 27, organised by the Ladies' Sewing Society and the Young Women's Social Union. It was opened by Mrs. Talbot, wife of the Town Clerk of Manchester, and in declaring the sale of work open, and wishing it and the church every success, she made a most inspiring and helpful speech, which will be long remembered by all who were privileged to hear it. In the evening a successful Café Chantant was held. The proceeds, amounting to nearly £80, were to form the nucleus of a fund for a new organ to be placed in the beautiful new church, now nearing completion. The fourteenth anniversary was held on Sunday, March 31, when the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson was the preacher. The collections amounted to £21.

Scarborough.—On Thursday, March 28, in connection with the Forward Movement, the Rev. J. Morgan Whiteman conducted a devotional service in the Westborough Church. He preached a powerful sermon, based on Hebrews, chap. 12, verse 42, saying that the true reason why so few people cared to live the Christian life was not due to intellectual difficulty but moral difficulty; they were not prepared to sacrifice their own particular "besetting sin," which would be incompatible with a true Christian life. On Friday night, March 29, a social gathering was held in the schoolroom. The Rev. E. Rattenbury Hodges (Newark) took the chair, and in his opening remarks gave a few hints as to what he thought would conduce to promote true Christian fellowship in a church. Mrs. Rawlings (York) gave an interesting and instructive address on Sunday-school work in different parts of the country. Mrs. Cooke spoke of the prejudice against Unitarianism among those who were in many cases ignorant of our views. Miss C. A. Wurtzburg addressed a few words of hopeful confidence for the future, while Messrs. Buxton and Kettle were also optimistic with regard to the future. The attendance at the social and the last two services of the Forward Movement have been very small owing to the severe weather, but it seems to have awakened a spirit of enthusiasm among the members, which will not die out because the official programme has been completed. The keynote of all the speeches on Friday was "Forward" in all things tending to the spiritual and intellectual health of the church.

Shrewsbury.—On Monday last the closing meeting of the winter session of the Band of Hope, in connection with the High-street Church Sunday-school was held. In the unavoidable absence of the President, the minister (the Rev. J. C. Street) presided. There was a large attendance of members and friends. A programme of songs, recitations, and instrumental music was most creditably rendered, and the evening was greatly enjoyed.

Stockport.—The annual meeting was held on Monday last, Mr. Leonard New, warden, in the chair. The officers of the church were duly elected. On the intimation that some £300 or £400 would have to be spent on re-facing and repairing the outside stonework of the church, cleaning and decorating the interior, and cleaning and decorating the Sunday-school, a member of the Vestry proposed that a subscription-list should be started for the purpose, to which he would give £10. Other similar sums were promised, and £50 from the treasurer; and in a few minutes the promises amounted to over £100, leaving no doubt that the sum required would be duly raised as soon as other members of the church had been appealed to. The Rev. B. C. Constable gave his annual address, in which he referred to the usual events during the past year, and the success of a newly-organised "social meeting," composed of ladies who had not been previously connected with any society belonging to the church. Meetings had been held every month, with an average attendance of about thirty; much useful work had been done, and the meetings had been much enjoyed. He also referred to the good attendances at the series of special services on "Music and Religion," the memorial service on the death of the Queen, the East Cheshire "Forward Movement" services, the flourishing condition of the Sunday-school, the successful flower service and harvest service in the schools, and the energetic and successful work of the School Auxiliary Society. During the year seventeen new members had been added to the church, in addition to nine young people from the Sunday-school, and to all these he desired to offer a most hearty welcome on behalf of the church. Through additional necessary expenditure the accounts showed an adverse balance; but it was resolved to meet this by the subscription-list already referred to.

Many people consider that the popular conception of the Bible is the most formidable obstacle in the pathway of Religious Progress. Unitarians are therefore invited to circulate this booklet among their orthodox friends, for although not actively sectarian in purpose, the outcome of a free inquiry naturally tends to the position Unitarians hold with regard to the Bible.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE officers of the London District Unitarian Society make an announcement this week, which will be found advertised in another column, and which, we feel sure, will command the interest and sympathy of our readers, not in London only, but throughout the country. Mr. David Martineau, after thirty years of untiring and devoted service, is about to retire from the office of Treasurer to the Society, and his brother officers and the Committee naturally desire to mark in some signal manner their sense of the invaluable services which he has rendered. At the approaching annual meeting of the Society there will be an opportunity of giving some expression to the warm gratitude which is so widely felt, and the officers make a specific suggestion, the fulfilment of which they are assured would be most congenial to Mr. Martineau's own feelings. Frequently during his tenure of office Mr. Martineau has cheerfully borne heavy deficits, incurred in the energetic furtherance of the work to which the Society is devoted. There is at present an accumulated debt of about £350, and the officers ask for a special subscription of that amount, so that Mr. Martineau may be able to present a clear balance-sheet, and in retiring from office leave the Society, as he would wish, free from debt. No words of ours are needed further to commend this object to the immediate and generous response of loyal friends.

IN another column will be found an article sent to us by a friend who is travelling in Palestine—an article written at Nazareth itself, and the more precious to us on that account. Enclosing it with a note written on the following day at Tiberias, our friend adds :—

"I am sitting now under the hill that slopes upward from the western shore of this lovely, sacred lake. The last rays of sunlight are just dying off the wild, barren crags and fissures of the eastern hills. The evening breeze ruffles the Lake surface, whose waters are dark blue near the shore, and bright green in the centre, and blue again at the foot of the further hills. The solemn beauty is too impressive for words, and the memories and associations of the past crowd in upon the mind and would render any attempt at utterance vain. Thought itself stops, and the mind can only surrender to the sway of feelings that may influence all the after years, and make life richer and more sacred for ever."

THE prospects of popular education are not encouraging. Just as we were fondly hoping that our elementary system was developing beneficially, both in regard to children in day-schools and young people and adults in evening classes, the path is blocked by an action which at the best could only be pedantic legalism, but which, we fear, cannot be freed from the charge of envious mischief-making. Many of our readers will have observed the reports of the decisions of one Court after another in respect to the School Board for London ; but comparatively few people are aware, apparently, of the gravity of the issue involved. Put briefly, the question is whether the School Boards—not in and about London only, but generally throughout the country—must in future restrict their operations within narrower limits than has been the practice heretofore ; and in the evening continuation schools cease to teach any young people over sixteen years of age. The contention which has been thus far pleaded successfully is that the Act of 1870 did not contemplate the extensions, both of subjects taught and of the ages of pupils, which have been made, under Government approval, in successive Codes for a long time past ; and if the final appeal to the House of Lords results, as is not unlikely, in confirming the decisions of the Courts below, a very serious change for the worse will have to be made.

IF the machinery existed anywhere else by which the science and art now taught in the schools could be adequately given to the children of the nation, the present position might be troublesome without being ominous. But the fact is that the School Boards constitute at present the only national provision for popular education ; the Voluntary schools, in whose behalf the present litigation has to a large extent been started, are as a class admittedly unequal to take up the instruction which is now said to lie beyond the legal limits of Mr. Forster's Act. The judges, while very properly expounding the Act with strict impartiality, have not been slow to indicate their sense of what might be done to set matters right, not only for the Boards who are charged with transgressing the law, but for the officials of the Board of Education, who have, not only without demur but actually with positive encouragment to the School Boards, shared in whatever illegality has taken place. A short Act enabling the beneficial extensions to be maintained, so that boys and girls might gain the advantages of more advanced and varied instruction, and the evening classes for young men and women might go on in their useful work, could easily be passed if the party in power were really anxious about the matter. We cannot but fear, however, that, in spite of the frequently repeated exhortations of statesmen that the nation must more ardently press forward in the path of culture if it is not to be beaten in the struggle for existence, the reactionary forces in and around the Government will render any such enabling Act an impossibility. The men who will spend millions without stint on armaments grudge the expense of a good mental equipment for the future citizens ; and those who hate the School Boards because they oppose the clerical party will naturally seize with avidity the opportunity which has been skilfully made, and will do their best to damage the present system, while the new system which is promised—or threatened—remains under the consideration of the Cabinet.

A CLERGYMAN at Stalybridge seems to have preached an extraordinary sermon of militant Old Testament morality at a special New Century service, attended by the Mayor and Corporation. The sermon, printed at the Mayor's expense and stamped with the Borough crest, seemed to the Rev. W. Harrison to demand public notice, and he therefore preached a vigorous sermon, now published, with the title "Joshua or Jesus, a Consideration and a Protest." (H. Rawson and Co., Manchester. 1d.) The repulsive doctrine of the Mayor's preacher Mr. Harrison remorselessly exposes, as "taking the crude, unworthy, and degrading views of God, held by savage hordes centuries before Jesus, and thrusting them on the Christianity of to-day," and concludes with an earnest plea for more of the religion of Jesus.

THE WHIT-WEEK UNITARIAN MEETINGS.

The programme of the meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the Sunday School Association, and the International Council is now ready, and a copy may be had by sending a post-card to Essex Hall. It consists of twenty pages, including lists of hotels, places to see when in London, and particulars about railway fares, &c. Every day's proceedings are carefully set out. The Rev. John Page Hopps will begin the week by an address to Elder Scholars at Essex Hall on Sunday afternoon, May 26; the Rev. A. N. Blatchford will speak to Sunday-school Teachers and Church Workers at Little Portland-street Chapel on Sunday evening. On Monday, May 27, there will be various excursions and conducted parties, organised by Mr. Ion Pritchard and a staff of willing helpers. The Essex Hall Temperance Association will hold its annual meeting in the evening, when addresses will be delivered by the Revs. R. A. Armstrong, C. W. Wendtè, P. H. Wicksteed, and others.

On Tuesday morning, May 28, the Sunday School Association will celebrate its anniversary by a breakfast at the King's Hall, Holborn, where the London Unitarian Bazaar was held last year. At the business meeting speeches will be made by the Revs. L. de Beaumont Klein, W. G. Tarrant, L. G. Wilson, Hopedale, U.S.A., and J. J. Wright. The President, the Rev. H. E. Dowson, will speak on "Retrospect," Miss Marian Pritchard and the Rev. C. J. Street on "Outlook." On Tuesday afternoon the annual meeting of the Postal Mission will be held at Essex Hall. Conducted parties will visit Richmond Park and Dr. William's library. On Tuesday evening there will be a Communion service at Little Portland-street Chapel, conducted by the Revs. Charles Hargrove, R. J. Jones, Wm. Napier, H. S. Solly, and T. P. Spedding. At St. James's Hall the devotional service will be taken by the Rev. V. D. Davis, and the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke will preach the sermon. The service will begin at 8 p.m. Mr. John Harrison will preside at the organ, and it is hoped that a choir of 300 voices will occupy the orchestra. Members of choirs all over the country are very cordially invited to forward their names to the Secretary at Essex Hall.

On Wednesday morning, May 29, the Rev. E. W. Lummis will conduct a brief devotional service at Essex Hall, followed by the annual meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, at which Sir John T. Brunner, Bart., M.P., will preside; several well-known ministers and leading laymen will take part in the proceedings. The President will entertain the officers of District Associations and Unions, and the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association at the Holborn Restaurant at luncheon, followed by a private conference for the discussion of ways and means of promoting and extending the Unitarian word and work. On Wednesday evening, the usual delightful conversazione will be held at the Royal Institute of Painters in Water Colours, Piccadilly. Additional accommodation has been provided, as a large attendance is expected. The names of about twenty stewards already appear on the programme of proceedings.

On Thursday morning, May 20, the Rev. F. K. Freeston will conduct a brief devotional service at Essex Hall, followed by the meeting of the International Council of Unitarians and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers, with an address by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, a report by the Rev. C. W. Wendtè, a reception of the Foreign Delegates, who will each be presented to the President by the Rev. James Harwood, Chairman of the Hospitality Committee. One or more papers will be read. In the afternoon the inaugural meeting of the National Guilds' Union for Young People will be held. On Thursday evening there will be a great public meeting at the Westminster Town Hall, Victoria-street, the President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in the chair, with speeches by Professor Reville of Paris, Dr. Crothers of Cambridge, U.S.A., Dr. Drummond of Oxford, the Rev. Joseph Wood of Birmingham, and the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie. Music will be provided by the united choir.

On Friday morning, May 31, in connection with the International Council, the Rev. L. P. Jacks will conduct a brief devotional service at Essex Hall. Papers are promised by Rev. Tony Andre, Florence; Rev. R. A. Armstrong, Liverpool; Professor Bonet-Maury, Paris; Professor G. Boros, Kolozsvar; Dr. S. M. Crothers, Cambridge., U.S.A.; Professor B. D. Eerdmans, Leiden; Rev. James Hocart, Brussels; Mr. Kristofer Janson, Christiania; Rev. N. Jozan, Budapest; Professor E. Montet, Geneva; Professor Otto Pfleiderer, Berlin; Pundit Sastri, Calcutta; Mr. V. Tchertkoff, Tolstoy's friend; Mr. Z. Toyosaki, Tokyo; Mr. Graham Wallas, London; Mrs. Humphry Ward, Rev. C. W. Wendte, Boston, U.S.A.; and the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed. The order in which the papers will be read will be announced later. Probably two papers will be read on Thursday, six or eight on Friday forenoon, and three or four on Friday afternoon. There will be no time allotted for discussion on any of the papers. In addition to the names given above the following delegates from abroad will attend:—Rev. R. Balmforth, Cape Town; Dr. J. C. and Mrs. Bose, Calcutta; Signor Bracciforti, Milan; Dr. C. G. Chavannes, Leiden; Rev. W. H. Fish, Colorado Springs; Dr. Fleischer, Broek op Langendojk; M. Ernest Fontanes, Havre de Grace; Rev. P. N. Hugenholtz, Amsterdam; Dr. Lemphfuhl, Berlin; Rev. R. S. Loring, St. Cloud; Madame Reville, Paris; Miss M. A. Westenholz, Copenhagen; Mr. W. S. Woodhead, Cape Town. Among those who have written expressing their warm sympathy with the meetings but regretting their inability to be present are:—B. Bjornsen (who, next to Ibsen, is the greatest writer of Norway), Professor H. Holtzman, Strassburg; Dr. Lunge, Zurich; Professor F. Nippold, Jena; Dr. O. Veeck, Bremen; and many others.

On Friday afternoon, from four to six, the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor of London will receive the Foreign and Home Delegates and Ministers at the Mansion House; and in the evening of the same day Sir Edwin and Lady Durning-Lawrence will hold a reception at Carlton House-terrace. Other social functions will be announced later. It is important that the names and addresses of ministers, delegates and visitors to the meetings should be forwarded to the secretary at Essex Hall with as little delay as possible, so that the invitation lists may be made out well in advance.

The brief summary which we have given of the proceedings during Whit-week will show that the New Century meetings in London promise to become the most representative and influential assembly of Unitarians and other liberal religious thinkers and workers ever held in this country. We strongly urge our people, especially the younger men and women, to make a great and devoted effort to attend the services and meetings. We hope there will not be a single congregation in England, Ireland, Scotland, and Wales which will be unrepresented. There will be no difficulty, we believe, in obtaining accommodation at a very moderate cost, if early application is made for rooms.

The Metropolitan of St. Petersburg has written a long reply to the Countess Tolstoy's protest against the excommunication of her husband. The reply is reasonable and in strict logic, if once the assumptions of the Holy Orthodox Church are granted. From that point of view the Count is already spiritually dead, and cannot possibly receive Christian burial; that would be "a criminal profanation of the holy rite." The excommunication is merely the statement of a fact, and is an act of love, by which it is hoped that the dead man may be brought back to the true life. The Metropolitan does not see that what he does in making such declarations is simply to damn the "Orthodox" position.

The Rev. J. A. Brinkworth wrote to us last week telling of a Government inquiry which is being made into the Charities of Wiltshire, and his attendance at the inquiry held at Upavon with reference to the chapel at Rushall. This chapel, which is supplied from Trowbridge, receives £30 a year from the estate of the Marquis of Queensberry. Mr. Brinkworth asks, What of Marshfield, whence the late Rev. Samuel Martin removed to Trowbridge? As to this old chapel, we understand that services were discontinued in 1883, and that previous to that date nothing had been contributed locally towards the support of the services for fifty years. The property, in addition to the building, consists of a field and £486 8s. 6d. in Consols. The chapel is let at present as a Reading-room, which is under unsectarian management, and the Trustees retain the right of holding Sunday services, should they see fit.

It is right to be thankful [for outward blessings]—God made the world; and it is by His ordering that these things come to us; but there is danger of preferring them to His love, as we might value a friend's gifts, and all the outward tangible demonstrations of his friendship, above the friendship itself. It is well that sometimes all these things should be taken from a man, that he may know them in their true character, as mere insubstantial symbols. They comfort the soul through the body, but the peace the Holy Spirit gives is God's unchanging hold on the soul itself—the consciousness that, living or dying, rich or poor, applauded or despised, we and all those we love are in the hollow of His hand.—May Kendall, in "Present Day Papers."

REGENERATION.

'Tis Love which kindles an immortal flame
In beings doom'd to die; one life they lose
To win another worthier of the name.
That higher, boundless life 'tis ours to choose:

And yet, alas! how many souls refuse
That sacrifice of self which sets us free,
God's bounty to ignoble ends abuse,
And miss the vision which the selfless see.

They know not that beyond them there can be "An ampler ether, a diviner air,"
Where spirits meet like rivers in the sea,
And lose themselves to find fruition there.

"More life and fuller!" Only when we dare,
Renouncing self, to follow where Love leads,
Can we in God's intrinsic glory share,
And reach at last the goal our nature needs.

The dawn predicts that perfect day succeeds:
By love translated to a higher sphere,
The faithful hound to save his master bleeds,
And in his death to life divine draws near.

While men to whom no generous wish is dear
Prate of their precious souls which cannot die;
Not knowing they are dead already here,
And vainly dream of life beyond the sky.

Chingford. R. Bruce Boswell.

LITERATURE.

ON A STUDY TABLE.*

A few notes are here offered to readers of The Inquirer on books which have fallen in my way during the last few months. Time for detailed study has been wanting. I can only record some general impressions.

The American series of New Testament Handbooks yields two admirable little volumes deserving wide attention—an Introduction to the New Testament (1), by Professor B. W. Bacon of Yale, and Jesus Christ and the Social Question (2), by Dr. F. G. Peabody, Plummer Professor of Christian Morals in Harvard University.

All students of the Hexateuch are acquainted with the name of Professor Bacon, who first showed his brilliant critical powers in his two books on "the Genesis of Genesis," and "the Triple Tradition of the Exodus." From a country parish he passed to the Yale Divinity School to fill the chair of New Testament exegesis. The manual now under notice is, I believe, the first book which he has published in his new field, though several important articles in the American journals have proved his continued activity as scholar and student. In his present volume he sums up in 279 pp. his view of the origins of New Testament literature, and the process of tradition in creating a canon by the end of the second century. The work is throughout singularly clear, fresh and independent. On the Pauline side it will be reckoned conservative, for not only does Professor Bacon allow Pauline elements in the Pastoral epistles, but he gives Ephesians and Colossians wholly to the Apostle, placing them in 58-59 at Rome. The Synoptic Gospels are assigned in their present form to the generation after the fall of Jerusalem, in the following order: Mark (Rome), 75-80; Matthew (Jerusalem ?), 80-90; Luke-Acts (Antioch ?), 85-95; and John (Ephesus) 100-110. With great skill in narrow compass does Professor Bacon indicate the complexity of the Synoptic problem. He finds the so-called two-document hypothesis inadequate to explain the peculiarities of Matthew and Luke compared with Mark, and pleads for the recognition of more intricate editorial processes than have been generally admitted.

Such a plea has unquestionably much in its favour. But then it requires more time than his chronology seems to allow, for it implies a continuous literary interaction, so that various stages must be distinguished, at least in the case of Matthew and Mark. The First Gospel, in particular, seems to have taken up into itself elements of second-century origin which bring its completed form to a later period than Dr. Bacon suggests. The treatment of Acts and the Fourth Gospel is full of incisive criticism. Reasons are given on the one hand for preferring the Johannine tradition (as in the duration of the ministry, or the day of Jesus' death); while on the other hand the fact that the book is an interpretation and not a record is stated with the utmost frankness.

With all due allowance, it is impossible to regard the set discourses of John, as a whole, as other than literary compositions by the author of the Johannine Epistles. The lofty Christology, the mysticism and spirituality of Paul, are presupposed in their still deeper, subtler mysticism. The Pauline doctrine of the pre-existence and mission of the Son, atonement, regeneration, life in the spirit, form a dominating element in the author's mind. Is he, then, presenting to us what he conceives the teaching of Jesus actually to have been, or is he purposely idealising? Probably neither. He is not consciously either historical or unhistorical. He simply frees his own mind on these essentials of Christian doctrine without considering the question of historicity. But we may well ask, Could the mind of an eye-witness and peculiarly devoted follower of Jesus be so emptied of the veritable utterances of the Master as to leave room for such idealisation? When we consider how others were perpetuating the historical discourses, an affirmative answer is not easy. (Pp. 260-1.)

The limits imposed by the plan of the series prevent Professor Bacon from entering on minute discussion of possibilities of diverse authorship within the Gospel. Displacements are recognised, and editorial handling is admitted. But we hope for some fuller statement some time from the pen of so competent a scholar.

The discussions summed up under the title Jesus Christ and the Social Question (2) are marked by the sympathetic wisdom, the clear-sightedness, the freedom from exaggeration which distinguish the religious teaching of Professor Peabody. If the study were a strictly historical one, exception might be taken to the free use of the Fourth Gospel as a source of equal value with the other three; or a fuller inquiry might be desired into the question how far the expectation of the swiftly approaching end of the age left any social order within view at all. It is, however, with the spirit of Christianity that Professor Peabody is concerned. He frankly asserts that the social horizon of Jesus' teaching was as remote from the problems of modern industrial life as though it were in another planet.

To turn to Jesus for categorical instruction concerning industrial organisation, individual initiative, or social control, is as preposterous as to inquire into his views concerning modern inventions or modern politics. Such phrases as Christian economics, in the sense of organising modern life under the direct regulation of Jesus, or Christian sociology, as a science of modern society directly defined by Jesus, or Christian socialism, as a form of government prescribed by Jesus, are as much without justification in the teachings of Jesus as it would be to speak of Christian astronomy or Christian science.

Accordingly, Professor Peabody has no fresh social theories to propound. He does not hurl denunciation at the existing industrial order, nor does he defend it as valid for all time. He shows us, first of all, what men are thinking about it, and his opening chapter is full of illustrations from American, English, and German writers, which reveal a singularly wide command of the literature of modern social movements. This is followed by an exposition of the social principles of the teaching of Jesus, the significance of which is found in their relation, not to organisation, but to character. Specific problems involved in the family (with special reference to the socialist state, on the one hand, and American divorce on the other), the rich, the care of the poor, and the present forms of industrial organisation, are successively discussed with a calm and balanced judgment based on profound faith in the spiritual possibilities always and everywhere open to all souls. Professor Peabody is convinced that there is no moral wrong for which the providence of God does not supply a moral remedy; and he emphasises again and again the necessity of following the method of Jesus by working from within rather than from without. The book is full of the wise and pointed sayings of a man who has habituated himself to look into the heart of difficulties, as well as to walk round them and examine them from opposite points of view. Let those who think it unduly optimistic remember that Jesus was the greatest optimist who ever lived.

With unwearied assiduity Professor R. H. Charles continues his series of studies in early Apocalyptic Christian literature. His edition of the Ascension of Isaiah (3) is marked by the same care and learning which have distinguished his previous works. Here are Ethiopic, Greek, and Latin texts side by side for the technical student, while for the general reader an elaborate introduction, an English rendering, and a continuous commentary, supply all the materials which he requires. In common with most of his predecessors, Dr. Charles distinguishes three elements in the book—(1) a Jewish "Martyrdom" of Isaiah, (2) a Christian "Testament of Hezekiah," and (3) a Christian "Vision of Isaiah." All three in their primitive forms may be brought (in Dr. Charles's view) within the range of the first century, while the date of their union cannot be later than early in the third (in the Introd. p. xlv., the word "not" has apparently dropped out from the first line.) The most interesting features are naturally those in the "Testament of Hezekiah"" and the "Vision of Isaiah." The first is concerned chiefly with the coming of Antichrist and the end of the world, and shows us incidentally the guilds or associations formed in the churches to wait for Messiah's advent and welcome "the beloved." This section gives Dr. Charles an opportunity for analysing with great skill all the elements of the Nero-Beliar-Antichrist myths, and the manner of their ultimate fusion. In the "Vision of Isaiah" the range is greater. The prophet is conducted into the seventh heaven, where both the Lord Christ and the angel of the Spirit join in worshipping and praising God. There he hears the Most High instruct the Lord Christ to descend through all the heavens as far down as to the angel of Sheol. From the fifth heaven onwards Christ is successively transformed into the likeness of each stage of angels, down to those of the air beneath the firmament, until, finally, he is born of the Virgin Mary, who (like the mother of the Buddha) suffers nothing as he comes into the world. The view of the universe and its various ranks of occupants which is thus presented is full of interest. But the elaboration of the whole process so much lacks reserve, that we cannot share Dr. Charles's confidence in its relatively early orgin, and the faint items of external evidence do not appear to us so decisive as to him. Very noteworthy in connection with the sources of many of the ideas and speculations which this class of literature contains, is the link supplied from the Persian story of Jemshid for the martyrdom of Isaiah with a wooden saw (Introd. p. xlvii.). The evidence of the extraordinary mingling of legends and beliefs in the atmosphere of Judaism and early Christianity continually grows. In this respect the parallel of the descent and birth of Christ and the Buddha is not without its significance. We trust that nothing will interfere to prevent Dr. Charles from carrying on his most valuable investigations.

A word of welome must be offered to Mr. Roberton's pleasant little book, entitled Voices of the Past from Assyria and Babylonia (4). The accounts of the excavations from the days of Botta and Layard down to the researches of M. Sarzec are excellent. Many of the illustrations of the significance of the cuneiform writing will be very helpful to those who wish to understand the mysterious process by which the same character may have several different values; and the versification of ancient poetical texts, for which Mr. Roberton modestly takes credit, agreeably smooths over the harshnesses inevitable in literal renderings. In the matter of some of his views, it may be doubted if modern research can always sustain his conclusions. The weighty authority of Friedrich Delitzsch has been recently cast against him in favour of a Semitic origin of the cuneiform script, while his pages confidently proclaim the old Akkadian theory as if it was absolutely certain. Is there any trustworthy scholar now who believes that the seal figured on p. 96 really represents the temptation, even with a "perhaps"? The authority of Berossos is surely erroneously invoked to sustrain the theory of a Chaldean origin for the story of the Tower of Babel; and the supposed cuneiform support is now abandoned (see, for instance, Gunkel and Holzinger in their commentaries on Genesis, or Cheyne in Encycl. Bibl.). Nor can the famous fourteenth chapter of Genesis be cited for determining the date of Abraham in the twenty-third century B.C. (p. 136). Mr. Roberton in no way writes from an apologetic standpoint. But his argument on this matter shows that whatever may be the value of the evidence for Khammurabi and the contemporary kings, he has not realised the historical and literary difficulties which surround the view that the story of Abram's pursuit had any basis in actual fact. The last chapter contains a convenient summary of the historic relations of Asshur and Israel. Many of the illustrations are excellent; it is to be regretted that in the inscriptions on the robe of Gudea (p. 159) the artist should have been allowed to put fancy characters.

The editor of the series, entitled "The World's Epoch-Makers," was ill-advised in assigning Buddha to Mr. Arthur Lillie. The little volume entitled Buddha and Buddhism (5) shows the same defects as Mr. Lillie's previous writings on the subject. Struck by many of the ethical parallels between the teachings of the Buddha and those of the New Testament, Mr. Lillie boldly proposes to derive the fundamental moral precepts of Jesus through Essenism from the Indian sage. Nor these alone: the fabric of doctrine follows. But of proof of the transmission he supplies not one jot. Assertion takes the place of evidence as in the following passage:—

> There is scarcely a doubt now with scholars that the early Christians borrowed the solution of earth's mighty problem from India. Christianity—at least the Alexandrian portion of it—is gnosticism, and gnosticism is the word Bodhi transferred to the Greek. Buthos, the abode of the inactive Father, is Nirvritti; and the illuminated Pleroma, presided over by Christ, is the Pravritti of the Buddhists (p. 20).

Our author remarks (p. 159) that "historical questions are sometimes made more clear by being treated broadly." His method accordingly is to ignore all established principles of investigation. He cites passages from documents of all schools and all centuries, from India, China, Tibet, Japan, as if they were all equally valid witnesses of the original teaching. The principal thesis which emerges from his somewhat confused exposition—namely, that the metaphysical theistic Buddhism of the "Great Vehicle" was in reality the primitive doctrine—cannot be maintained in face of the evidence presented by the Pāli texts. The arguments of Professor Rhys Davids are absurdly travestied by an author who is bold enough to declare that the story of Rahula is not to be found in the Pāli scriptures (p. 87)—Mr. Lillie may read it in the Majjhima-Nikāya, Vol. I., pp. 414-420. No attempt is made to explain the conditions of thought in which Buddhism grew up, or to indicate the relation in which the Buddha stood to his contemporaries. The writer's ability to understand his subject may be judged by his courageous assertion that Buddhism overturned the institution of caste (p. 212), or by his naïve remark (p. 190) "St. Paul is very contradictory about the atonement. This passage seems pure Buddhism"—and then he quotes Romans v. 18! The book abounds in irritating mis-spellings, which cannot all be set down to the printer.

Whatever Professor George Adam Smith writes is certain to be marked by a fine scholar ship and a profound religious sympathy. These qualities are not wanting in his last book on Modern Criticism and the Preaching of the Old Testament (6), eight lectures delivered at Yale University. The object of the book is to provide a fresh apologetic, and to prove to the preacher that he is no worse off under the new methods of historical inquiry than he was under the old systems of typology and Messianic prophecy. In the opening lecture, the liberty and duty of Old Testament criticism is skilfully deduced from the practice of Jesus and the apostles. The course and character of modern investigation are sketched with a firm hand; nor will any one charge the author with unwillingness to face the issues in the matter of the historical character of the patriarchs. The fourth lecture deals with the proof of a divine revelation in the Old Testament. This is derived from two facts; in the first place the origins of the religion of Israel can be proved to be substantially identical with those of the Semitic peoples around; but in the second place its higher forms far transcended anything that was reached by the peoples of Canaan, or of Mesopotamia. How is this difference to be explained? Professor Smith states his argument with such reserve and moderation that we can gladly follow him, if we can be sure that he is willing to extend his conception of the divine method of the education of the race, and recognise (for instance) in the philosophy of Greece a similar witness to the influence of God's mind on man's. But the plea in the next chapter for the spirit of Christ in the Old Testament brings us perilously near to abandoned modes of accommodation. Who would dream of looking for it, for instance, in the Song of Deborah? True, Zebulun and Naphtali risked their lives for freedom. But does that justify the expression "The battlefield was the Golgotha of early Israel"? And would the historian of Greece think it natural to celebrate Thermopylae and Marathon by saying that "there the spirit of Christ which was in [the Hellenes] from the beginning won its earliest triumphs"? The sense of unreality which such language awakens, should warn us against trying to dress up our historic judgments in the misfits of the old theology. A remark (p. 160) implying "the legitimacy of Matthew's reference of the [Emmanuel] prophecy to Jesus" excites little short of amazement, though Professor Smith informs his readers that the Hebrew original of the term rendered "virgin" is indefinite, and means some marriageable woman; on the other hand, nothing can be more straightforward than the treatment of Isaiah ix. 6, where no gospel allusion needs to be vindicated. On the whole, the book will seem curiously unequal to the careful reader. He will wish that the subject of Messianic prophecy had been more fully treated in the new light, and that the significance of the Psalter with its great call to the nations to join in the worship of the only True had been developed in connection with post-exilic history. The long section on the history of the exegesis of the prophetic writings (pp. 216-265) appears out of proportion to its successor (pp. 265-274) which deals with their social and political preaching. But it is a more agreeable task to thank Dr. Smith for the fine insight of his last chapter on the Wisdom literature, and for the noble faith and inspiring moral enthusiasm which pervade the whole book.

OBITUARY.

MRS. BROOKE HERFORD.

Many friends, both in this country and in America, will hear with sorrow of the death of Mrs. Brooke Herford, who passed peacefully away at Bournemouth on Saturday last. The companion for nearly fifty years of her husband's ministry, her life was rich in beneficence, animated always by a lovely spirit of unselfishness. We hope next week to publish a fuller memorial notice by an intimate friend of many years' standing. The funeral was on Thursday, at Hale, Cheshire.

THE REV. WILLIAM BINNS.

A year and a-half ago the Rev. William Binns retired from the active ministry to which he had devoted his brilliant gifts for forty-one years. He continued to reside at Blackpool, where he had been for six years minister of the Banks-street Unitarian Church, but his strength was failing. In July last year he suffered a very grievous blow in the death of his wife, his devoted companion for thirty years, and now we have to bid him also farewell. He suffered during the last weeks from cardiac asthma, from which the welcome release came to him last Saturday afternoon, in his seventy-fourth year. We have lost a very loyal friend—a man of great power and striking personality—whose influence was always stimulating, if it often roused antagonisms; a man always frank and staunch in loyalty to what he deemed to be right, and for the friends who knew him best rich in a tenderness unsuspected by those who saw only the rough exterior.

William Binns was a Yorkshireman, a native of Bingley, in Airedale, where he was born on Oct. 10, 1827. Some schooling he had, but he was mainly self-taught, having always an eager passion for reading and a strenuous desire for knowledge. His first employment is said to have been as booking-clerk at the Midland station in his native town, and he spoke of himself as having been a country-postman. As a young man he was a local preacher among the Methodists, but his keen intelligence could not be held within the lines of thought expected of him in that connection, and he became a Unitarian. In December, 1854, at the age of twenty-seven, he joined the newly-formed Unitarian Home Missionary Board, in Manchester, under Dr. J. R. Beard, to be trained for the ministry, and what he was at that time, his friend and fellow-student, the Rev. J. C. Street, tells in the tribute which follows this notice.

At the conclusion of his course at the Board, Mr. Binns, in April, 1858, became minister of the Unitarian Church, Charing-cross, Birkenhead, and with a break of two and a-half years, from October, 1868, when he was at Devonport, he served that congregation and the wider community of the town of Birkenhead for twenty-five years. It was in January, 1869, soon after his removal to Devonport, that he married Frances, the daughter of Mr. Frederick Chapple, a Liverpool merchant, whose devotion to her husband was always beautiful to see, and who, by reason of her intellectual gifts and moral ardour, was for him an ideal wife. His ministry from that time was immeasurably strengthened by her whole-hearted co-operation.

In Birkenhead the chief work of Mr. Binns's life was done; but at Plymouth, to which he removed in the autumn of 1887, and subsequently at Blackpool, his power as a striking and stimulating preacher, a brilliant lecturer, a good citizen devoted to reform and especially to the intellectual enlightenment of the community, made itself similarly felt. An ardent lover of Shakespeare, with a wide knowledge of literature, in each of these towns he and Mrs. Binns were largely instrumental in the founding of a Shakespeare society which became a public institution of far-reaching influence, and especially in Birkenhead Mr. Binns was long recognised both in this connection and in his pulpit as one of the strongest and most welcome elements in the higher life of the community. At Birkenhead he was also a political force not to be ignored, an ardent Liberal and follower of Mr. Gladstone, until the Home Rule division, which brought separation to so many chief friends. From the passing of the Education Act he was the constant advocate of the School Board, until the victory was at last secured for Birkenhead, and he and his wife were also specially interested in the work of the Charity Organisation Society.

For several years Mr. Binns was a leader-writer for the Liverpool Mercury, and a frequent contributor to the Liverpool Review and other papers. Our own columns for many years bear witness to his brilliant and versatile gifts, his last substantial contribution having been in August, 189?—two interesting articles on "John Wesley's Life and Journal." He was also a contributor to the Westminster, the Theological and the Modern reviews, in the first of which his article on "The Heresies of the Working Classes," in 1862, is specially remembered. One of the most characteristic of his essays was a brilliant article on "Matthew Arnold as a Religious Teacher," in the Theological of January, 1878. In that same year Mr. Binns preached the annual sermon of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association on "The Permanent and Transient in Religion," and in 1881 gave the third of ten lectures published as the volume on "Positive Aspects of Unitarian Christianity." His subject was "The Supreme Moral Law," and it was the subject nearest to his heart, to which he constantly returned in earnest and eloquent exposition, through his strong hold upon which he found his unfailing faith in the living God, and the spiritual life of man beyond the reach of death. As a religious teacher he brought faith and courage and new light to many. If he also pained some of his friends, particularly in latter years by the manner in which he criticised the advocates of Total Abstinence, it was done, we believe, with characteristic sincerity, and entirely without malice. We refer to this only because we are sure that he would wish frank words of truth to be spoken; and as we now think of him, admiration and gratitude for what he has given us far outweigh any other feeling, and we bid him farewell, rejoicing, as he would have us rejoice, in the new life to which he has now attained.

A FELLOW-STUDENT'S TRIBUTE.

In the passing away of William Binns one of the most picturesque and notable men of our ministry has fallen from our ranks, and left us all the poorer. For upwards of forty years he has been a prominent worker, and he was able to use his splendid gifts as a preacher almost up to the last days of his life. When the clarion call to the young men of our churches, sounded by the late Dr. J. R. Beard, was heard in the vales and hills of Lancashire and Yorkshire, there came a response such as would hardly be possible now. No widespread educational facilities existed then. There was no school-house near every cottage and homestead as to-day. Many a bright youth, born and nurtured amid poverty and hard labour, longed for means of culture in vain, and the loss to our national life was consequently very great. But even amid gravest disadvantages some exceptional lads gathered all sorts of out-of-the-way knowledge, read every book that came in their way, could be seen as they went to and fro to work conning some treasured volume, and turning every precious moment to account. In our Sunday-schools they learned to write and cast up accounts. Men of position and culture consecrated their gifts to Sunday-school teaching, and so reached and influenced these promising lads. It was wonderful to note what development took place. Many of these youths were stirred with a great ambition. Eager to learn, they were also ready to teach. In the school-house, in mechanics' institutes, in mutual improvement societies they found their double opportunity. Powers of speech were cultivated. Village platforms, and the forums of town debating societies were turned to account, and powers were developed that only needed the graces of culture and inspiration to make them influential for good in the life of both Church and State. Young men like these were stirred by Dr. Beard's appeal. He caught them at the very moment of their need. It was a remarkable group which presented itself to Dr. Beard and Mr. Gaskell when they opened the doors of the Home Missionary Board.

Young men between the ages of twenty-one and thirty-five, gathered from mill, shop, school-house, bench, and village postmen, but all with exceptional gifts, were eager to learn and filled with a desire to serve their fellow-men. Among this group, and notable among them, was William Binns. Sturdy, unhewn, and ungainly, he soon showed the real grit there was below the surface of his peculiarities, and gave evidence of powers of thought and utterance which marked him out as first among his fellows. Already his reading had been wide. He revelled in Shakespeare and Ben Jonson. The Elizabethan age was peculiarly attractive to him. But he was also saturated with a knowledge of the Books of the Bible. Isaiah, the Psalms, the Book of Job fascinated him; and the wonderful life of the Carpenter of Nazareth drew him like a spiritual magnet. Dr. Beard and Mr. Gaskell found in him a student eager to learn, and ready to digest the best things they could offer to him. His gifts as a speaker were soon turned to account, and his fame as a supply in many of our smaller churches soon began to be sounded. Strange stories were told then, and to the end of his career, of his eccentricities; but he was always a welcome preacher, and when his three years of study were over he left behind in the College, among the Lancashire churches, and with his tutors, the reputation of an exceptionally gifted man, who would be sure to make his mark and do a great work.

His studies were wide and varied, but it was mainly in the realms of English literature and in philosophy that his best powers were employed. For forty-five years his name was heard everywhere among us. He was always a notable figure. His sermons and speeches were marked by careful preparation, and were illuminated with literary graces and mother wit, so that they were always heard with pleasure, or waited for with pleasing curiosity. He served our churches with unflagging zeal, and was known everywhere as a man of genius and power. He gave, to those most capable of judging, the impression of great mental powers, and men expected from him great things. But somehow he seemed to be content with smaller things than they expected. Yet whatever he did was well done. Whatever the outward man might be with its story of his eventful past, written in gesture and quaint speech, there was no slovenliness in his utterances. His thoughts were orderly and well compacted, and the evidences of his reading were furnished by apt quotation and story, so that his hearers always felt they were in presence of a master-mind. He will be greatly missed. He was a man by himself; he filled his own niche, and won his own place. As a comrade, a fellow-student, a preacher, a platform speaker, he will leave an aching void, but he will be remembered with great affection and respect by those who knew him best. As to the deeper things of the spirit, I must not write. He had his own spiritual oratory, wherein he sought and found his God, and gained the sanctities which made his life well-rounded and complete.

ANOTHER TRIBUTE.

Come lovely and soothing death,
Undulate round the world, serenely arriving, arriving,
In the day, in the night, to all, to each,
Sooner or later delicate death.

No one with firmer faith, no one with deeper meaning could have taken up and made his own, the above lines. No one has better taught men the bravery of soul which makes such words possible; no one has more faithfully led that simple, open, self-revealing life which in its wholeheartedness and deep devoutness makes eternal life an axiom instead of a theory.

A stern true friend, independent himself and encouraging always self-reliance in those who sought his advice; because he never condescended to conventional flatteries, one approving word of his was worth whole volumes of ordinary praise. Beneath a rugged exterior beat a heart wonderfully sensitive. His tenderness in the hour of trial or loss always came as a revelation to those who judged him by externalities. Strong-willed, radical by temperament, intolerant of subterfuge, hypocrisy and opportunism, few have succeeded in raising so many antagonisms, but, for himself, no man was his enemy nor ever could be. The saving grace of humour was his in such large measure and the virtue of forgiveness was so much his distinguishing characteristic, that not only did he bear no malice or hatred in his heart, but he compelled all, save the most obdurate, to offer again the hand that had been withheld.

A leonine man, shaggy, uncouth, not always to be approached; massive, but not slow. No velvet paw his, and in it were no talons ready to spring from their sheaths. When he shook his mane great was the upsetting of china, and great the consternation of "correct" personages; those who loved him easily forgave that weakness which came eventually to delight in making the tea-things rattle.

To some of us he was a veritable tower of strength, almost a second conscience also. The scattered essays, sermons, reviews and addresses which are the remains by which alone another generation will know him (surely worth collecting into a single volume), are to us priceless, but they are dumb beside the speaking portrait and the eloquently undecipherable letter from his hand.

'Tis good that he is free at last.

WILLIAM WESTERMAN.

It is with unfeigned sorrow that we record the death of Mr. William Westerman, so long and so honourably associated with the church at Domestic-street, Holbeck, Leeds. He had known no other religious home; for, having been brought to the Sunday-school when a babe, he remained "a faithful son" in our "household of faith" throughout the long period of more than fifty years. In the latter part of last year he had to relinquish business, but, regaining strength a little, he would venture forth, seeming to be more like his wonted self; but during February he suffered a severe relapse. The end came early in the morning of March 20—painless and peaceful, our beloved comrade having passed away in his sleep.

In the Mill Hill Calendar the Rev. Charles Hargrove gives the following tribute to Mr. Westerman's memory:—

"The loss of Mr. Westerman, who for many years past has taken a leading part in the affairs of the Holbeck Church, will be deeply felt by all old members. He was 'a good Unitarian' in the truest sense of the word—earnest, large-minded, diligent in business, trusted and honoured by his employers, had in affectionate regard by members of the congregation he belonged to. He was not yet fifty-four years of age, and but a little while ago all looked forward to his growing old in the service of his church and his firm. Now we can only hope that the example he has left will bring forward others to fill up the ranks, and go on with the work he and we have been so long interested in."

Mr. Westerman has been much missed at school and church during his protracted illness, and will be more missed now that he has gone from us. He had been scholar, teacher, superintendent in the Sunday-school, deacon, officer, and chairman of committee to the church. Unostentatious, unassuming, retiring, he yet was known to all; and was distinctly one of those who "let not his left hand know what his right hand did." Many a poor widow and other hard-pressed but brave-hearted women found a helpful friend in him.

His loyalty to Sunday-school and to our faith bespoke real conviction, and the best interests of society lay very near his heart.

By dint of perseverance, by probity and integrity in business, he had risen from position of clerk to that of manager in the service of Messrs. Ward, of Kirkgate, Leeds, winning the confidence of the firm by his application to duty and by his sterling character. As a citizen, he took keen interest in all municipal affairs, and, whilst Liberal in politics and religion, he was ever ready to help any good cause, so that his memory is fragrant far beyond the bounds of his own church and party.

As husband, father, brother, friend, he was loved greatly; and alike by rich and poor held in high esteem and respect. His generous large-hearted sympathy was made potent by his unselfishness. To his intimates he was always ready for a quip and a crack, with kindly humour and human drollery. Perhaps the outstanding feature of the man was the large portion of the spirit of the unspoiled child which lived in him.

The deepest sympathy is extended to the bereaved family, and was abundantly demonstrated at the interment and at the "In Memoriam" service, when very large and reverent companies gathered to pay their last tribute of affection and respect. Let us thank God for those who have been, and pray Him grant that none of life's disciplines fail of their high end.

THE HILLS OF NAZARETH.

It is early morning, and the mists lie thick around our tents and fold us in, silent and chill. It is well so on this first morning in Nazareth, for the modern town, with its hotels and churches of many sects, is thus hidden away, and one may dream of a village that once was here, close by, among these upland hollows, wherein was a carpenter's house and workshop, and a boy, destined to change the courses of human history through long after ages, who wrought by his father's side in homely toil. Very beautiful to me is the grey, cold mist of this quiet hour of dawn, drawing its soft veil over the ugly and obtrusive present, and letting the mystic, ideal past come back for a while. Perchance the old was no better or more fair than the new. The little ancient town, built probably somewhat higher up the northern slope, may have been no more attractive to the eye than this to which we climbed from the plain of Jezreel last night, and its people no more ideal than those who came about our tents to sell things or to stare and beg. But it was different; it pertained to another age and race; it nourished the life and thought of a young prophet, and in its synagogue on a Sabbath Day he once "stood for to read." The Jesus of Nazareth whom we reverence and idealise belongs to another Nazareth than this on which, presently, to-day's sun will shine. And I may muse of that other for a little, while the soft vapour of the hills clings to the ground and hides the actual from sight.

The form of a woman comes out of the mist, walking slowly across the little grassy slope on which our camp is pitched. She is tall and erect; the folds of her long loose robe fall lightly down to her bare feet, as she steps silently over the dew-laden grass. Her face, once beautiful I think, is sad and grave as she turns to ask some question of the men who are preparing their morning meal over a charcoal fire. Swiftly and unbidden comes the thought, that even thus might Mary of Magdala here come in the early morning to ask some question of Jesus or his disciples. Magdala is far hence, in Eastern Galilee, and that Mary would hardly have been in ancient Nazareth. But the form, the dress, the grave and thoughtful face, the quiet voice—these might have been like this woman's. So, at least, amid these changed conditions of time, one welcomes something human, natural, unsuspecting, that revives the past.

A bell in the modern Greek Church below rings out harshly and strange to the ear, calling to morning service; but the mind heeds it not. A light breeze stirs among the branches of an olive tree, close at hand, and its damp grey-green leaves quiver a little. Its gnarled trunk tells of many years' growth. It is older, perhaps, than the church and its clanging bell, and to-day, for the traveller, seems more real, and speaks to some deeper feeling, and calls to a simpler worship and a more spontaneous morning prayer.

The Syrian woman departs and goes slowly down the hill; the voices of children come from the road below; the mists give way and creep up over the higher slopes; the warm glow of sunlight comes. It is day, and modern Nazareth is there. The past will not return.

Reaching a crest of one of the Samaritan hills yesterday, Tamari, our trusty dragoman stopped his horse till we came alongside. "There," said he, pointing to the far north, "is Hermon; and this nearer hill is Little Hermon, and that is Mount Gilboa, and yonder"—pointing to a central height in the Southern Galilean range, and speaking with a tone of exultation in his quiet voice—"yonder is Nazareth." We could see a gleam of white lying just under the summit of the hill, and realised then, what we had so often read, that the home of Joseph and Mary nestled thus, high and secluded, among the "upland hollows" of the stony hills of Galilee.* It seemed to be raised aloft toward heaven, and yet sheltered by the rocky fastnesses of earth. Surely some "good thing" might come from such a place, though the contemporaries of Jesus thought they could "search and look" for it in vain.

We took our first long glance at Nazareth and the wide sweep of hills on either side of it, and majestic Hermon, snowclad and sunlit, far beyond; then descended the last of the rugged tracts of Samaria, and with that white gleam on the Galilean heights always before us traversed the lovely and fertile plain of Esdraelon, till, late in the afternoon, we climbed a long winding rugged track, and found our tents in a little olive orchard, facing the "En-Nâsira" of to-day.

I finish this little paper as the sun is setting, and his clear calm light lies on the surrounding hills. It is there, on those hills, that we have spent most of the day—not in the hot town, seeing the show-places of the different religious sects. It is Sunday, and we felt that the purest air and the holiest memories were on those heights.

The prophet of Nazareth would be nearer to us in places where the "lilies" still are "clothed," and "birds of the heaven" are fed. The hills belong to him in a way that the streets of the town do not. Before he began to teach and to preach, they must often have been his sanctuary and the scenes of silent inward questioning and of lonely reverent thought.

And now, as the light fades from off the long curved outline of those summits, I can think how he must have walked and wondered there, and how the great thougths and divine sympathies of his after ministry were borne in upon him there, and the "Spirit of the Lord" came upon him, and his destiny of love and sacrifice was determined by that mystery of grace which we to-day may know in fellowship with each other and with Him.

W. J. J.

Nazareth, March 17, 1901.

* Nazareth is 1,237 feet above sea level. The highest of the hills which surround it, forming the cuplike hollow in which it lies, is 1,600 feet; the lowest about 1,400.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

Habit.—I.

If you come to think of it, how much of our life is spent in doing or being the same thing in the same way, day by day, week by week, year by year. This doing or being the same thing over and over again is Habit.

Not long ago you were told in a charming way about the interest and pleasure of studying the habits of birds in field and hedge-row, or in town parks and gardens. I could not help thinking it would be even more interesting and useful for you to study the habits of children, to try and look at yourselves a little as God and your parents and teachers look at you. For just as God gives instincts to the birds, and helps them to form habits for keeping themselves alive and happy, for building their nests, rearing their nestlings, and cheering us with their song and beautiful bird-life, so He gives you as wonderful powers of body, and still more marvellous powers of mind and spirit, and Himself sets you, or directs your elders how to start you practising these powers, that you may grow up with the habits of healthy, orderly, clever, industrious, unselfish men and women, to be and to do all for which He made you alive.

Now one reason why we form habits, why it comes natural to want to do or think or feel the same things over again, is that we find out quite as babies that it is easier to do anything a second time than the first, and much easier the third time than the second. With what delight a child begins to walk alone as its tumbles and totterings become fewer! Before you can cycle, you find that you have to ride at first with help, then cautiously by yourself, that you do not feel inclined to run into the second vehicle you meet quite so much as you did the first, and that after daily practising, the habit of cycling becomes as natural and pleasurable as that of walking. Think of some other habits—keeping oneself clean, minding one's own business, thinking of other people more than oneself—in all these, "practice makes perfect," because they grow easier the oftener you do them.

This ease, moreover, is passed on from parents to children. A habit is partly born in us. So, you learnt to walk upright on your two legs more easily than the babies of the earliest men and women, who were still somewhat monkey-like in their ways, and I have no doubt that you little girls will learn to cycle more readily than your mothers and aunts did, who were the earliest women to accustom their nerves and muscles to the habit of riding a bicycle. I know it is easier for you to be kind and loving than the children who lived before Christ started people in the habit of feeling that human beings are all children of one great family of God their Heavenly Father.

Yes, our life is a very curious bundle of habits, silly and useless, wise and useful, good, bad, and indifferent.

The foolish little habits are a nuisance, are not they? "Hands in pockets," eh? boys. Do not I know many lads whose lives are a misery till mother has cured them of feeling shy, if they do not thrust their hands into their trouser pockets? Fancy your courage and ease of mind depending on an ungainly meaningless trick with the hands! And girls for the same reason play with their hair, or stand on one foot, or cross their legs ungracefully when they sit down.

I am not going to talk about the downright bad habits. We all know them only too well, and don't you think that the best way to give up, indeed never to start, the bad habits, is to think only of the good ones? Try that plan. If you make up your mind to be orderly, there is not much chance of your being untidy. If you keep your intention of being punctual, you will not be late. If your heart keeps full of good temper and love, there is no room for bad temper and hate. If you act and think and speak only what is true you will never know the misery of a lie.

Emily H. Smith.

These are the flowery fields, where first
The wisdom of the Christ was nursed:
Here first the wonder and surprise
Of Nature lit the sacred eyes:
Waters, and winds, and woodlands here,
With earliest music charmed His ear,
For all His conscious youth drew breath,
Among these hills of Nazareth.

The quiet hills, the skies above,
The faces round were bright with love;
He lost not, in the tranquil place,
One hint of wisdom or of grace;
Not unobserved, nor vague nor dim,
The secret of the world to Him,
The prayer He heard which Nature saith
In the still glades by Nazareth.

LONDON, APRIL 13, 1901.

CHURCH COVENANTS.

A SPECIAL report of great interest has just reached us from the American Unitarian Association. A resolution was unanimously adopted at the annual meeting of that Association, held in Boston last May, in pursuance of which the President appointed a committee, of which he himself was to act as chairman, with the following instruction :—

> To collect and codify the church covenants and statements of faith now in use, to the end: first, that any church may be assisted in forming some basis of membership for its followers; and, second, that some wise system of presenting and teaching our faith to the young may be devised.

To the committee thus appointed the Rev. LEWIS G. WILSON acted as secretary, who, we are glad to hear, is to be among our American visitors at the Whitsuntide meetings. To him we are indebted for the report, which summarises the results of careful inquiries, and concludes with certain recommendations which received the unanimous assent of the committee.

Of the 459 churches enrolled in the American Unitarian Year-Book for 1900, replies to the questions of the committee were received from 250, from all parts of the United States and Canada, and from churches the most diverse in character and situation; thus the committee had ample material for the consideration of the questions with which they were asked to deal.

The replies to the first question, "What is the covenant of your church?" show that 90 out of the 250 churches have, in the actual words or the substance of them, adopted the covenant recommended by the National Conference of 1899 :—

> In the love of truth, and in the spirit of Jesus, we unite for the worship of God and the service of man.

Of the rest, 41 have no statement of any kind, while 111 report some other Covenant, Bond of Fellowship, Preamble, or Affirmation of Belief. Some of these are very theological; others are simply business statements. Many of them have long ceased to have any practical bearing upon the life of the church. One helpful statement, which is quoted in full, is as follows :—

> We hold the objects and aims of the Christian Church, and this as a branch thereof, to be the upholding and growth of character; the getting and doing of good; the furtherance of knowledge and practice of divine law and duty, and works of charity, and good will toward men.
> We avow it our religious duty to seek truth and encourage the search thereof by others, from all sources whence it may be found, allowing and fostering perfect liberty of thought and conscience for each, with responsibility only to the Judge of all.
> We acknowledge our obligation to walk in amity and peace with our brethren, to promote the welfare of this church by support of its instrumentalities for good, by acquiescence in its councils, by attendance on its services, and, above all, by consecration of ourselves to a spiritual life, and striving in all ways to live as followers of the Master and children of God.

A considerable number of the churches have inherited from former generations the institution of a church within the church or congregation; but even where the old organisation has survived it has become for the most part inoperative, and the prevailing conception is of one body of worshippers, whether called "Church," "Parish," or "Society."

As to what should be the basis of membership in such a religious society, the diversity of usage as to covenants shows what various opinions there are. One position is that of the minister who says that the bond of fellowship in his church is "interest in what is going on." And he adds :—

> The test of membership has never been defined. We pay our bills. We have good congregations. We love each other. We find homogeneous action easily attainable. We look up and we enjoy life, and we give away all we can. If it became needful at any time to decide who belonged, I suspect we would make contribution of money the test. But we pray that the day of such things may not come.

While such an attitude must not by any means be taken as proving carelessness to the real significance of the church as a centre of spiritual activity, there is evidently a growing feeling that something more definite in the way of acknowledgment of a common purpose and distinct acceptance of a duty is needed.

With regard to the training and welcoming of the young people into avowed membership of the church, there does not seem to be the same strong body of opinion as in the matter of covenants, but a certain number of the churches have Confirmation or Preparation classes and special services for the admission of new members. Some of the replies strongly urge the use of some other term than "Confirmation" in this connection. Only eight of all who replied were positively opposed both to the name and the thing. The following reply is quoted as representing the average feeling :—

> I am a great believer in the Confirmation Class—perhaps a new thing under the old name; for I mean simply a class of young persons instructed in the principles of our faith and our church history; and appealed to to try more earnestly to translate their creed into life.

The committee report strongly in favour of the systematic instruction of young people in the principles of their faith and the value of their rich inheritance, and as the result of their whole investigation conclude with the following recommendations :—

1. We recommend a single and inclusive organisation for our churches. This organisation should be the church. [This, as we understand it, refers to each separate congregation, which is to be homogeneous, in the sense of having no "church" within the church.]
2. We recommend the adoption in each of our churches of some brief and simple covenant or bond of fellowship which will express the purpose of the church life.
3. We recommend a definite and clearly defined church membership, consisting of those who have accepted the bond of fellowship. Voting on all matters pertaining to the finances of the church should, however, be restricted to those who have made some stated contribution toward the support of worship.
4. We recommend that the members of the church be received into its fellowship by some simple public service of recognition, and that the younger people of the church be prepared for such membership in a religious study-class under the direction of the minister.
5. We recommend that the list of members be accurately kept up and carefully preserved.
6. We recommend that, when members of a church remove to another community wherein there is a Unitarian church, letters be addressed at once by the minister and clerk of the parish to the minister and clerk of the parish to which removal is made, recommending the friends to the hospitality of their new church home.
7. We recommend that a special committee of the Association be appointed to suggest methods for conducting the preparatory class of young people and appropriate services of fellowship.

In making these recommendations the committee of course claim no authority over the affairs of the "free Congregational churches that acknowledge the Unitarian faith and fellowship," with which they are connected, and recognise that local conditions may make some of the suggestions undesirable, but they ask for a patient and serious consideration of the results of their investigation. And knowing how much the same questions are occupying the thought of earnest members of our churches in this country, it seemed well to pass on these suggestions for their consideration also.

SMALL THINGS AND GREAT—AND GOD.*

BY THE REV. JOHN PAGE HOPPS.

"The Lord doth build up Jerusalem: He gathereth together the outcasts of Israel: He healeth the broken in heart, and bindeth up their wounds: He telleth the number of the stars: He calleth them all by their names."—Psalm cxlvii. 2—4.

Thoughtfully reading these words, the first thing that might occur to us is the linking together of these two affirmations—that the God who tells the number of the stars and calls them all by their names is also the God who heals the outcast's broken heart, and binds up his wounds. What a suggestion of the illimitable great and unreckoned small! What an arresting suggestion of infinite grasp! He who counts and orders and names His suns and stars, like chariot steeds, and determines their movements, and maintains their speed—the great mathematician and master of the music of the spheres—is He who broods over the poor outcast in a garret, and hovers by the bedside of the labourer in the hospital, healing the broken in heart and binding up the sufferer's wounds.

Is that poetry only; or is it sober fact? Will it do here, in the Church, as a pleasant picture, or shall we be able outside to feel its truth? Let us see: though, at best, in this amazing world, we can only feel our way.

There is only one way in which God can be everywhere and in all things; and it is here that the definition of "Our Father's Church" helps us—God is "the inmost uplifting life of all things." Nor is that saying merely poetic and vague; for, picture it and explain it as we will, there is an "inmost uplifting life of all things." We see nothing as it is in itself: we see only what the inmost cause manifests. Flowers and children's faces are manifestations of "the inmost uplifting life." If you could see that life, you would not see flowers and faces, which are but the outward and visible signs of the inward and invisible grace—you would see God. Even a grain of sand has an "inmost uplifting life" which causes it to be, or seem to be, a grain of sand. Smash it and subdivide it, and get to the minutest particle of it, and even then the secret is as far off as ever. Follow it as far as eyes and instruments go, and you will be still no nearer. "The inmost uplifting life" or force or thrill is still its mystery and its cause. And that is true everywhere—of the merciful healing tendency of time, and of the blessed law in the human body which leads the wise physician to say "All we can do is to help Nature," to clear away impediments, to make straight in the desert a highway for our God—that is, for the healing power. And the harmony of stars and suns is an expression of the same "inmost uplifting life." The mathematics of the heavens is in nowise different from the healing harmonies of earth; and the cause is the same, whether you call it Providence or law, Gravitation or God. So, when this fine old Hebrew sang of the Lord who shepherds the stars, and binds up the outcast's wounds, he could only mean—or, at all events, we can only mean—that there is a God-force, a God-order, a God-life in everything—a force, an order and a life pervading all things unbrokenly; here manifesting itself in the healing of a cut finger, with its own blood, and there revealing itself in the skylark's song, or the musical movements of the skylark's wings, or the music of the movements of suns and stars, and boundless systems of suns and stars, which never fail to keep perfect place and time in that tremendous dance of worlds throughout all space.

Everywhere "the inmost uplifting life" is a healing force wherever possible. The soothing "oil and wine" of the good Samaritan had a good God in them; and the goodness of the good Samaritan and the virtues of the healing oil and wine were equally manifestations of the heavenly Power. The curative virtue of a medicine is its "inmost uplifting life." Even the so-called disease may only be the effort of "the inmost uplifting life" to free itself from injurious elements. Many "diseases" are Nature's efforts to expel the enemy, and to heal. Her tendencies and functions are all for unfolding, uplifting, cleansing; and if they cannot prevail to heal, there comes the merciful ending, and Nature is "justified of her children."

All this which is true of suns and stars, and broken hearts and wounds, is true of our great complex and many-sided human life as a whole. It looks a hopeless chaos, just as the starry heavens may look to a rustic who understands nothing of astronomy; or as the medley of life upon the earth may look to one who knows nothing of Evolution. But there is order at the heart of it—music above and harmony below—and God the All in all, because the One manifesting Life and Force in all. We are face to face with a Divine Ideal working itself out in this immense drama of human life; and God is calling upon us to help Him, and we are helping Him. You teachers are helping Him, and He is helping you; for this longing to serve and bless is the "inmost uplifting life" in you.

This is the faith we need in these days. It is doubtful whether the world ever needed it as much. The poor world always seemed chaotic in its struggle onward; but such a complication of chaotic conditions it probably never knew before.

Does not this, then, contradict all that I have said? It would if we kept short accounts with God. But short accounts are impossible with God, as His great workman, Evolution, shows. One of the Hebrew poets understood this when he said that part of man's wrath would God restrain, and part He would use: and Hamlet, crying, "Praised be rashness!" said that "our indiscretion sometimes serves us well," and this, he says, should teach us that—

> There's a divinity that shapes our ends,
> Rough-hew them how we will.

All history suggests it, though the price poor Humanity pays is awful enough at times; and yet the paying of the price may itself be a part of the process of creation, just as the struggle to learn is itself a part of the process of education.

What, then, does this fine old Hebrew utterance say to us? We cannot imitate God in His grasp and comprehension of the stars, but we can be consolers and healers of the outcasts. And what a lesson there is in it! How apt we are, when we think we are seriously occupied, to be impatient of minor things! Here is a man who has great duties to attend to, and he says, "Oh, I cannot be bothered with that poor woman," "with that case of the injured man," "with that sick child!" What a suggestion, that it is the namer and forth-leader of suns and stars who consoles and heals! "Don't trouble me about it!" says the great small man. "Come unto me all ye that labour and are heavy-laden, and I will give you rest," says the truly great, the God-like man. Ah me! let the strong be pitiful; let the great be gentle; let the most wise teach the most ignorant; let the rich learn that "blessed is he who considereth the poor!" The wise Jesus taught all that when he said: "He that is greatest among you, let him be as the younger; and he that is chief, as he that doth serve."

Do you remember that amazing picture of the coming king in the 72nd Psalm? Oh, how the world is longing for him! It has never had him yet.

> In his days shall the righteous flourish; and abundance of peace so long as the moon endureth. He shall have dominion also from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth. They that dwell in the wilderness shall bow before him, and his enemies shall lick the dust. The kings of Tarshish and of the isles shall bring presents: the kings of Sheba and Seba shall offer gifts. Yea, all kings shall fall down before him; all nations shall serve him; for he shall deliver the needy when he crieth; the poor also, and him that hath no helper. He shall have pity on the poor and needy, and shall save the souls of the needy. He shall redeem their soul from fraud and violence, and precious shall their blood be in his sight.

Did you ever hear elsewhere of such a king? In his days shall the righteous flourish—not the conspirators, the robbers, and the men of blood; and there shall be boundless peace; and the men in the wilderness shall reverence him; and his enemies shall yield to him and love him; and the common kings shall do him reverence; why? why? Listen! Because he shall be the deliverer of the needy, and the friend of the poor, and the champion of the helpless, and the shield against deceit and violence, and the valuer of the blood of the oppressed. Where is that king? Alas! we look for him in vain. But, if he ever came, he would indeed be God's vicegerent upon the earth.

But if we cannot get that king, we may at least work for that ideal of government and life, and so reverse the order of centuries. Until now, the ideal of government and of life has been the rule of the strong for the using up of the weak; but one day the ideal of government and of life will be the rule of all for the helping of the weak—and he will be king anywhere who can best help and serve. For remember—and note well the tremendous thought—that God Himself does all that the Hebrew poet said; and yet we know He does it only through His instruments. Who or what are His instruments in the ordering of the heavens, we know not; and what glorious hosts help Him there, no man can say: but we know that in many ways we are His instruments upon the earth. Through mother-love, and physician's skill, and teaching power, and tender sympathy, and militant indignation against wrong, and the soul's hungering and thirsting after righteousness, and the common kindness of master and mate, the great God works. So we must not think we discharge ourselves of our duty by giving a little money: we must give ourselves—and we can. The master in the factory or shop; the mistress ordering her maids, down to the little creature at the sink; the kindly teacher; the shop mate, can all be true kings in their way—in God's way; for the hired hands, the young apprentice, the little maid floating out into "service" for the first time, the boys and girls in the school, the shop mate, the played-out old worker, waiting now only to know what society is going to do with him—all want God, and all want us, and all can get God's help through us.

And remember, too, that Jesus made the Son of Man's welcome turn at last entirely upon this:—"You saw me hungry, and you fed me; you saw me thirsty, and you gave me drink; you saw me a stranger, and you welcomed me; you saw me naked, and you clothed me; sick or in prison, and you came to me—come in, beloved one, to my joy."

Then shall the righteous answer him, saying, Lord, when saw we thee hungry, and fed thee? or thirsty, and gave thee drink? When saw we thee a stranger, and welcomed thee? or naked, and clothed thee? Or when saw we thee sick, or in prison, and came unto thee?

And the King shall answer and say unto them, Verily, I say unto you, Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brothers, ye have done it unto me.

Of course that is the ground of the Brother's welcome, for the Father, who counts and names and directs the suns and stars, also consoles the outcasts and bindeth up their wounds—or, in mercy, stills the grieved senses and broken heart, and takes the stranger in.

Does any one say: And what has all this to do with Sunday Schools? Is it possible that any one has not seen bright children's faces all the way through—and the faces of uncouth lads and restless girls, and the poor little "outcasts of Israel" that all England knows? Think again, and listen to one who knew the Father well:—

Whoso shall receive one such little child in my name receiveth me, but whoso shall cause one of these little ones to stumble, it were better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck, and that he were drowned in the depth of the sea.

Ah! see your calling, brothers and sisters! Let the mightiest serve: let the man or woman, most like a little earthly god in rank and influence and greatness of occupation, come here and look on the great heavenly God. Come and imitate Him, in His loving condescension, in His gentle ministries, in His healing tender mercy. Come under the tremendous canopy of His heaven, and learn what this means for you: "He who telleth the number of the stars, and calleth them all by their names, doth build up Jerusalem: He gathereth together the outcasts of Israel: He healeth the broken in heart, and bindeth up their wounds."

DR. WARSCHAUER ON UNITARIANISM.

Sir,—Dr. Warschauer's letter in your current issue has interested me profoundly. My thoughts have kept recurring to it for the past five days.

It interests me because it seems to me the most distinct enunciation we have yet had from one ministering in our group of churches of a view of Christianity which has lately appeared amongst us, and which is widely divergent from that which many others of us hold.

Dr. Warschauer opens up the matter by saying that "there has been a tendency in Unitarian thought to make Christ no more than a great ethical and spiritual teacher." Now, I do not think that this can be said to be merely "a tendency." It seems to me rather a fulfilled achievement of Unitarian thought. One of the great marks of Unitarian thought during the last forty years has been sure and steady progress towards this conception of Jesus, not as a Mediator in the Evangelical sense, but as a mighty Teacher—a Teacher, indeed, by life and example as well as by word, but still supremely a Teacher—a Teacher of the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man. For Unitarians Theodore Parker began this development, and was persecuted and contemned. But as a very old and dear ministerial brother writes to me in a letter received to-day, "Which of us is not a Parkerite now?"

Well, certainly Dr. Warschauer is not, nor would wish to be. He holds that "there can be no living Church apart from the living Christ, the Incarnate Son of God," and rebukes those of us who do not think with him for "refusal of a divinely proffered means of access through a unique Personality in whom the divine and human elements are perfectly mingled." And I fear I must incur his condemnation when I express my glad conviction that through many other agencies—through evangelists, prophets, martyrs; through the glorious ministry of nature; through deep experiences of life and many a whispered message in the soul—we have "divinely proffered means of access" to God and life and joy.

Dr. Warschauer would have us take up his attitude towards Christ to prevent calamity to our churches and in the interests of "contagious fervour and irresistible enthusiasm"—which one would suppose must abound in all churches of orthodox creed. Personally I do not believe that his theology is more likely to kindle fervour and enthusiasm than a simpler Christian Theism. But even if I did, I should deem the most "calamitous" thing that could happen to our churches to be this: that any of us should adopt a given view of Christ or of the relation of the soul to God for any other reason than that to our inmost mind and conscience it approves itself as true.

I am proud to belong to a religious fellowship which can embrace opinions so divergent as those of Dr. Warschauer and my own. But I do not wish convictions which are sacred to me to be apologised for or mildly disparaged as "tendencies" to be regretted.

Lastly, I should be very grateful if Dr. Warschauer would tell me from whom amongst us he has heard an "oft-expressed belief in 'the humanity of God and the divinity of man.'"

THE RELIGION OF THE INCARNATION.

Sir,—Dr. Warschauer is mistaken in supposing I had any motive in questioning his use of the word "Incarnation" other than that which I avowed. I have admitted that there is probably little difference between my own views and those published by Dr. Warschauer in the Seed Sower. I maintain that "the Incarnation" is improperly used if it is intended to mean no more than that. Or, perhaps I should make my meaning clearer if I say it cannot mean as much as that. Dr. Warschauer associates all men with Christ in participation in the Indwelling Spirit; what difference there is is a difference in degree only.

The "Incarnation" isolates Christ from the rest of mankind and regards him as a being removed, not only in degree, but in nature, from all other members of the human race. I do not see how the same term can cover doctrines as wide apart as those of Dr. Ellicot and Dr. Warschauer.

So far from being in favour of the "letter," as Dr. Warschauer suggests, it is because I am on the side of the spirit that I object to label a spiritual doctrine with an ecclesiastical and dogmatic term. But I do not remember that I have objected to anything beyond the misapplication of a phrase which has been "ear-marked" for so many centuries. I may add now that I regard it, in view of its accepted meaning, as not only inappropriate but inadequate as a description of Dr. Warschauer's views, as it certainly is of mine.

In his last letter to The Inquirer Dr. Warschauer introduces other questions and uses language which does not appear, on the face of it, to be consistent with his original propositions, but I assume he means the same thing.

Walter Lloyd.

Gloucester, April 10.

Sir,—Having read Dr. Warschauer's letter in your last number, I venture to offer a protest against the tenor of his concluding remarks. As one who was brought up amid High Anglican traditions, and who at no slight cost of feeling broke away from these under the constraint of larger religious ideas, I cannot see without dismay an attempt to emphasize a doctrine of "Incarnation" which is, it seems to me, perilously akin to that taught in "orthodox" quarters. When there is laid down, as especially needed for the vivifying of our Free Churches, a doctrine of Christ as the "unique Personality in whom the divine and human elements are perfectly mingled" (what verification of this could ever be offered on the finite side?), and when, at the same time, special emphasis is placed on the Mediatorial capacity of Christ, I ask myself whether it was for nothing that I fought my way out of Orthodoxy! For surely, Sir, such an interpretation of Christianity as Dr. Warschauer offers can have but one result—the renewal of old conceptions as to a Special Exceptional Revelation.

I think it may not be deemed irrelevant if I quote a passage from that very stimulating pamphlet "The Faith of a Free Church," by Dr. Samuel M. Crothers. Speaking of "our faith in Christ" he says:—"For myself, I believe that the glimpses we have of the historic Jesus justify the spiritual ideal we have formed of him; but this belief must be founded on historic evidence. The faith of the soul in goodness is independent of this. . . . If the story of the 'highest, holiest manhood' is not history, then it is prophecy. . . . He who has given himself in full loyalty to the Christlike life, finds something remaining steadfast through all intellectual change. Something, he says, I have found supremely good. If it is manifested in an incarnate God, I will worship Him: if it is manifested in one man, him will I follow: if it is manifested in a growing ideal of the race, I will give myself to that ideal, and seek to realise it. But whether in God, or man, or growing ideal, whether realised in time past, or hoped for in time to come, in whatever height of Deity it is, in whatever depth of suffering humanity, on it my heart is fixed." Underlying these words may we not find a truer and more satisfying conception of our faith than could be looked for in any renewal of Special Incarnation theories?

"SACRAMENTARIAN."

Sir,—It is somewhat remarkable that the word Sacramentarian is frequently used in a sense which is the exact opposite of its original meaning. Many persons make the mistake of speaking of Sacramentarians when they intend to denote those who hold high or extreme notions of the efficacy of the sacraments. But, as technically used in Church history, it denotes persons who hold a low view of the sacraments, and is applied to the party among the Reformers who were opposed to Luther's doctrine. A Sacramentarian is defined in Webster's Dictionary as "one who rejects either the Roman Catholic or the Lutheran doctrine of the real presence of Christ's body and blood in the sacrament of the Eucharist or Lord's Supper." At the Diet of Augsburg the Sacramentarian party put forward a Confession of Faith which "rejects the doctrine of a corporeal presence, and although it admits a spiritual presence of Christ which the devout soul can feel and enjoy, it excludes all idea of a physical presence of Christ's body." This view of the Lord's Supper is generally associated with the name of Zwingli, and is the one which is commonly held by Unitarians and other liberal Protestants. It would therefore be correct to say that most Unitarians are Sacramentarians. On the other hand, if we wish to refer to those who hold the Roman and High Anglican doctrine of the Real Presence, we should describe them as Sacramentalists. There is no reason for using the wrong word when the right one is ready to our hands.

MANCHESTER DISTRICT SUNDAY-SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

The fifty-sixth annual meeting was held at the Brookfield Church and Schools, Gorton, on Good Friday. The day could not have been better for such a gathering, and this, coupled with the attraction of the new schools, the presence of Mr. Page Hopps as preacher, and the promised second distribution of medals in commemoration of long service, doubtless helped to swell the attendance into a record one. Certain it is that numbers were there—at service, business meeting and public evening meeting, all space being fully utilised. A heartiness and deep-seated enthusiasm characterised all the proceedings from the singing of the first hymn, "Let us sing the praise of Love," to the pronouncing of the Benediction with which the evening meeting was closed. Great credit is due to the Gorton friends for the excellence of their arrangements and for the way in which they catered for their 800 guests at lunch and tea. Simply to mention that there were somewhere about a hundred voluntary workers is sufficient to show that Brookfield intended the day to be a success so far as they had to do with it.

The religious service, conducted by the Rev. J. P. Hopps, was beautiful in its simplicity, and all through ran the note of pleading for oneness, for help and strength that man may help and strengthen his fellows, and for a large pure idealism. For the reading Mr. Hopps gave a selection from the Psalms and a passage on "The Ideal King," showing that the true idealist is the most complete practical man. The sermon will be found printed in full in another column. The collection amounted to over £18.

THE BUSINESS MEETING.

After service the President received the representatives of other Associations in the schoolroom, as follows:—The Rev. W. G. Cadman (Sunday School Association), Mr. H. Titford (London Sunday School Society), the Rev. J. Kertain Smith (North Midland Sunday School Association), the Rev. F. Allen (London and South-Eastern Sunday School Union). Luncheon followed, and in the afternoon the business meeting was held in the church, the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, the retiring President, in the chair.

COMMITTEE'S REPORT.

The report opened with a reference to the national loss sustained in the death of the Queen, and said of her: "She lies enshrined in the hearts of her subjects as a noble woman, and her best monument will be the faithfulness to duty in her people like that which inspired her noble life." Particulars were given as to the publication of "Hymns and Choral Songs," both of the new number and of the old bound volumes, for which there was a steady demand. There was a good record of examinations, the visiting of schools, and of winter lectures. The work of the Temperance Branch had not been so successful as had been hoped. During the year 45 children (as compared with 64 in the previous year) had enjoyed the benefit of the Red Cross Seaside Home. As to the Holiday Home at Great Hucklow, full particulars were given, as to which our readers have been kept acquainted. The Home, which was opened by the President on July 7, had since been occupied by 736 visitors, of whom 656 stayed the full week open to them; of these 314 were over sixteen years of age. Additional land had been secured on a ten years' lease for the building of dormitories adjacent to the dayroom, which were considered essential to the success of the scheme. It was expected that the new buildings would be ready for occupation by June 1. The Rev. S. H. Street, who had accepted ministerial charge of Bradwell, Flagg, and Great Hucklow, had been appointed Superintendent of the Home. The report contained a second, and final, Teachers' Long Service List, including fifty-four names of teachers whose length of service ranged from 20 to 54 years. At the head was Miss A. Taylor, Rawtenstall, 54 years, and, second, Mr. D. Baxter, Longsight, 43 years. The general account showed a deficit of £30 on a total of £220. The statistical return showed 80 schools on the roll at the close of 1900. In the 68 schools from which returns were received in time to be utilised there were 1,413 teachers and 13,564 teachers on the books, of whom 4,081 were over sixteen years of age.

The President, in moving the adoption of the report, spoke of the deep feeling which had been stirred by the Queen's death, and the great influence she had exercised on the social life of the people, in the encouragement of all who were engaged in good works. He then referred with great satisfaction to the work of the convalescent and holiday homes. The statement as to the Twentieth Century Fund showed a balance of only £57 in hand, but since the printing of the report this had been increased to close upon £338. On the building account in connection with the holiday home there was likely to be a further expenditure of £665, and additional furnishing would probably cost £200 more. At the very least, therefore, they must raise about £900 to meet the liabilities which they actually knew of, and extra liabilities in connection with building must, of course, be expected. The report showed that the temperance work of the Association was not in a satisfactory condition — they had not done enough. He hoped more temperance speakers would offer themselves, and that in the future the Association would be stronger in that department of its work. In conclusion, the President expressed sympathy with Mr. J. Reynolds, the statistical secretary in his illness.

The resolution was seconded by the Rev. B. C. Constable.

In the discussion which followed it was pointed out that the number both of teachers and scholars showed a falling off during the past ten years, and the Committee was requested to investigate the matter and report on the causes.

The Rev. C. J. Street said there was the same complaint in all denominations.

The Rev. A. Cobden Smith pleaded that singing should receive more attention, and advocated the establishment of school choirs with a competition each year between the various schools.

The Rev. W. R. Shanks referred to the Manchester Whit-week activities which prevented attendance at the meetings in London, and trusted that arrangements might be made for the holding of the annual meetings in London at a time when it would be more convenient for Manchester ministers and delegates to attend.

The report having been adopted the officers and committee were elected, the Rev. S. A. Steinthal being re-appointed President, and Mr. D. A. Little and the Rev. John Moore general secretaries.

A cordial vote of thanks was passed to the Rev. J. Page Hopps for his sermon.

Responding to the President's welcome to representatives from kindred associations, the Rev. W. G. Cadman referred to the publications of the Sunday School Association, and laid stress on the value of "The Helper" which was a book not for one year only, but which would be found useful to a teacher at all times. He also referred to the coming New Century meetings and hoped that the Manchester Association would be well represented.

Mr. H. Titford spoke of the choral competition in connection with the London Sunday School Society, and showed that it had been of advantage to the schools in producing better singing. He also pleaded for more active interest in the Temperance section of the work.

An invitation to the Association to meet next year at Todmorden was accepted.

Mr. Cuthbert C. Grundy then presented long service commemorative medals to the fifty-four teachers referred to in the report. The medal presented to Miss A. Taylor, who had served for fifty-four years, was of gold, the others were silver.

THE PUBLIC MEETING.

In the evening a public meeting was held, the chair being taken by the Rev. George Evans, who on behalf of his congregation welcomed the visitors to Gorton.

On the motion of Mr. T. Harwood, seconded by Mr. J. Wigley, a cordial vote of thanks was passed to the congregation for their hospitality, and Mr. Thomas Grundy, the local secretary, responded.

The Rev. J. H. Wicksteed, of Padiham, then gave an address on "A great religious teacher—Friedrich Fröbel," for the following summary of which we are indebted to the Manchester Guardian:—

Summary of Mr. Wicksteed's Address.

Although he knew very little about Fröbel he was always, he said, being impressed with the fact that many people knew even less, and this had emboldened him to undertake his subject. Some four or five years ago he stumbled, almost by accident, across Fröbel's great work, "The Education of Man," and, knowing nothing of the sort of book it was, he took it up. The moment he read the first sentence he had an experience which was not often repeated in a lifetime; he was obliged to close the book because he felt that in that first sentence there was so much to think about. It seemed that the moment he came into contact with that great man something appealed to him in a peculiarly deep sense. Mr. Wicksteed proceeded to detail the history of Fröbel's life, and showed how Fröbel discovered that teaching was his native element, and that physical work, if done properly with the mind open, was education, and not simply a means to education. Deeply, passionately fond of children as Fröbel was, his theories of philosophy went deeper than the education of children. His philosophy was full of passionate conviction, and he felt the truth of what he said so much that his language seemed to break down under the weight of his thought and emotion, and in his book he seemed to want to get the whole of his thought and philosophy into every sentence. One should call Fröbel, therefore, not so much a philosopher as a prophet, and even more than a prophet—a poet, because his writings were so full of the beauty of life. His great leading idea was the unity of creation, and he felt that we could not begin to live until we realised that there was something running through this great universe which bound it into one system that was full and working with one great life behind—a life uttering itself in countless diversity, but still one single life—the thought, the mind of God, the Creator. Fröbel's philosophy might be explained by two words—the word universe and the similar-sounding word university. According to Fröbel true education was to teach ourselves to penetrate beyond the infinite variety in the world to the central unity which gave it meaning and purpose. That diversity and unity were so joined together in each individuality that each individuality expressed the two. Each man was a unity. The more we knew a man the more we felt the unity which ran through his body, soul, and mind, so that each part of him seemed to be characteristic, and the more we saw of his nature the more we felt its unity and its individuality. Each new soul told us what God is as no soul had told us before, and the infinite diversity of human beings still spoke to him who could see the inner in the outer of the great unity—the Creator, God Himself. Fröbel's philosophy was an attempt to fathom the very nature of man, and to fathom God's nature as revealed to us. When he attempted to bring the universe and the study of the universe into the education of man he came to the university, which was the ideal place where unity with diversity should be understood. He regarded every child as a creative spirit, and unless so-called teachers saw in the child, at the very beginning, its creative spirit it was quite impossible for them really to teach it or to educate it at all. It must be realised that a child was creative, and that it was necessary in all that the child learned that it should create something. Fröbel taught children by living with them, and the motto on his grave was "Parents, live with your children." We must enter into sympathy even with the beginnings of life and make child-life one with our own in the attempt to discover the life of God which lay behind all things. Sunday-schools were places where we might live with the children in investigation and in love with the beautiful and wonderful things in this world, which, the more we know of them, seemed to lead us nearer to the central unity of life, and therefore to God Himself.

The Rev. J. Ruddle, in opening the discussion, said English children must necessarily be taught according to the English tradition and also, England being a Christian country, according to the Christian tradition. If children were made acquainted with what the best Englishmen had done and written, what they had hated, and what they had loved and died for, surely we should have a better kind of patriotism than was sometimes seen in our streets. What was wanted in Sunday-school teaching was a definite idea. The old Sunday-schools were better than the Sunday-schools of these days, because the children, who were there taught writing and arithmetic, had something to do. Now they were only told things, and Sunday-schools were going down. Children must be put to doing something with their hands—if it was only to knitting stockings to give away, and then Sunday-schools would begin to grow again. He advocated branching-out gradually. First let our children be made worthy children of the English people and worthy of Christian tradition, and if there was a broader development on "University" lines that would come later.

The Rev. Joseph Freeston said he was not quite sure that the subject was exactly adapted to the work of Sunday-school teachers. It was a subject for the educators of the nation and for parents. If only parents had the downright spirit of education of Fröbel and Pestalozzi they could do much for the real training and education of their children. The Sunday-school teacher saw so little of his pupils that he could do but little; if, however, he could acquire the spirit of Fröbel, that would carry him some distance even in his few opportunities. Object-lessons should be more common than they were. Teachers would find great advantage result if they would first get their pupils to tell all they knew of any given common object, and then state their own knowledge upon it.

Mrs. Wicksteed said she had started a kindergarten Sunday-school in London upon the suggestion of an American book, "Sunday-school Teaching on Kindergarten Methods," and had found it a great success. She would gladly get the book for any friends who desired it—the cost, she thought, would be about a shilling.

Mr. S. Ashworth desired to pay his personal testimony to the value of Mr. Freeston's teaching founded on Pestalozzi and Fröbel's method, and he trusted that more rambles might be arranged.

Mr. C. C. Grundy felt that the real success of Sunday-school teaching depended largely on the unity between teacher and class.

Rev. S. A. Steinthal stated that the principles which Fröbel laid down were for all life, although he applied them chiefly to the children. It was good that we should recognise in play an educational purpose.

Mr. Wicksteed replied, and the proceedings concluded with the Benediction.

NORTH MIDLAND SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

The annual meeting was held on Easter Monday at Belper, and brought together a number of interested workers who have otherwise but scant opportunity of conference. We began with a devotional service, whose calm and helpful spirit had a fit setting in the quaint old chapel which breathed its associations of quiet faithfulness and strong loyal permanence into all who followed the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas (of Nottingham) in prayer and lesson, and listened to the thoughtful discourse of the preacher, the Rev. C. J. Street, of Bolton.

The business meeting, presided over by Mr. E. J. Chapman, of Leicester, gave an opportunity of reviewing the condition and prospects of our schools in this district. There were varied reports of slight improvements in some cases and slight falling back in others, but the general state of things appears to be that of holding our own as to numbers and other external particulars, while there seems to be an increase in efficiency and a more earnest attempt to vitalise Sunday-school work and fit it to the present-day needs.

Addresses were delivered by the representatives of the Manchester District (the Rev. S. H. Street), and the Midland Sunday School Union (Mrs. Wright).

In the evening a stimulating paper, the fruit of ripe experience and endeavour, was read by Mr. W. J. B. Tranter, of Birmingham, entitled "How shall I fit myself for the growing needs of my scholar?" It was unfortunate that so many friends, who had travelled from remote places, had to hurry away to catch their trains; and the Secretary and Committee hope that in future years arrangements may be devised which will adapt these useful meetings more to the convenience and interests of our scattered school workers. NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Blackley.—The new school, which has been in course of erection during the past nine months, was opened on Saturday week. The proceedings began with a service in the chapel, conducted by the Rev. W. Holmshaw, the preacher being the Rev. Dendy Agate, B.A., who spoke on the influencing of child life. There was a good attendance of members of the congregation and visitors. At the close of the service a silver key was presented by Mr. J. J. Brown to Mr. George H. Leigh, who had accepted the office of opener. Mr. Leigh then proceeded to the school, unlocked the door, and declared the building open. Following this ceremony, tea was served in the school to a large company. Between tea and the evening meeting an organ recital was given in the chapel by the organist, Mr. Julius Shaw. The evening meeting was presided over by the Rev. W. Holmshaw. Addresses were given by the chairman, Mr. Leigh, the Revs. Dendy Agate, G. Street, J. Ruddle, J. W. Bishop, Mr. Knott, Treasurer of the Building Fund, and Mr. Cook, the architect. The addresses, which were of a helpful character, were interspersed with music. The occasion was felt by all to have been a gratifying success, and the members of the congregation, together with those who work in the school, are rejoicing in the possession of a building which is excellent both in design and in arrangement. The school stands on the westerly side of the chapel. The accommodation provided consists of schoolroom, 40 ft. by 30 ft., with platform, 20 ft. by 10 ft., having a retiring room at each side. There are three excellent classrooms, lavatories, kitchen, and cellar. The building has been well done by Messrs. Bullivant, of Manchester. A considerable sum remains to be raised ere the building can be freed from debt, but it is hoped that, by means of a bazaar and the help of friends, this desirable end may very soon be attained.

Cardiff.—On Wednesday evening, April 3, the last meeting for the winter term of the Social Union was held at West Grove schoolroom, when a very successful dramatic performance of the three-act comedy, entitled A Prude's Progress, was given before a large and appreciative audience. During the season just ended, lectures and papers have been given on the following subjects:—"The Great Federation," "Spiritualism," "Some Alpine Literature," "Chat on Art," "A Tour through Norway," "Down East: How Londoners Live," "The National Arms and Emblems of Wales," "In the Land of Wherries and Windmills," "The Poetry of the '45,'" "A Holiday in Brittany," "The Secret of Evolution," and "Chopin and his Music," with musical selections.

Glasgow: St. Vincent-street.—The second number of the new series of the Monthly Record tells of encouraging attendances at the Sunday services, and the determination, at the suggestion of the Rev. J. Forrest, to continue to hold a monthly Sunday evening service throughout the summer, and not to close the church in July. The Ladies' Social Sewing Society's Sale of Work, on March 29 and 30, realised over £125.

Hunslet.—The Yorkshire Forward Movement has been attended here with gratifying results. A service was held each Thursday night in April with an average attendance of ninety-four. The Sunday evening attendances during the month were also very good. The movement evoked considerable enthusiasm in the congregation, both young and old, freely engaging in the distribution of hand-bills, of which 10,500 were printed and distributed, while hundreds of tracts have also been given away. A considerable number of strangers have attended who were never in the chapel before, and some interest was also aroused among members of other churches. A number of former attenders who have not been in the chapel for many years have also been present at some of these services. The week-night preachers were the Revs. C. H. Cook, J. Morgan Whiteman, W. Harold Davies, and W. Mellor. The mission was brought to a close on Good Friday by a public tea-meeting in the schoolroom, which was well attended. A most inspiriting meeting was afterwards held, when able and encouraging addresses were given by the Revs. A. Chalmers, E. Ceredig Jones, W. H. Eastlake, J. Morgan Whiteman, C. H. Cook, and John Fox, the latter occupying the chair, in the unavoidable absence, through indisposition, of Mr. John Thornton. Altogether the mission has been a most refreshing time.

London: Furnival-street.—We are asked to state that at the next meeting of the Christian Unitarian Mission Workers, at 5, Furnival-street, E.C., on Wednesday evening, April 17, at 7.30, Mr. D. Delta Evans will give an address on "Why Unitarians should engage in Missionary Work?" A hearty welcome to all.

London: Stepney Green.—At the monthly afternoon conference at College Chapel on Sunday last, Miss Florence Hill read a paper on "Brotherhood and the Home-Life." After contrasting various confraternities with true Christian fellowship which recognises the essential likeness and equality of men and the perfectibility of their nature, she passed on to describe the characteristics of an ideal home, and its value in training the young and developing the highest qualities of manliness and womanliness. Several obstacles to the realisation of the home ideal which belong to our present social state were discussed, and all were urged to assist in every way to bring about conditions favourable to the development of good homes from which the noblest Christian Brotherhood may arise. Several ladies and gentlemen joined in a discussion, which was conducted with great animation and interest to the last moment of time allowed. In the evening Miss Hill gave a second address in the chapel on "The Gospel of Peace." She graphically described the horrors of war and the beauty and benefits of peace; pleaded earnestly for arbitration, and urged all men, women, and even children to spread the principles of peace which alone can bring about the moral evolution of the world. A collection was made for the South African Fund for Distressed Women and Children.

Macclesfield (Resignation).—The Rev. A. Leslie Smith, B.A., has resigned the pastorate of King Edward-street Chapel. The Chapel Committee have expressed their appreciation of the zealous manner in which he has discharged his duties as their minister. He closes his ministry on May 17.

Manchester Domestic Mission.—To the great regret of the friends of the Mission, the Rev. S. H. Street, B.A., will on Sunday next terminate his ministry at the Renshaw-street branch, and the work which he has so ably and vigorously directed there for the last eight years. Pending the appointment of his successor, the committee have arranged with Mr. Sutherland, a layman, to take temporary charge of the vacant post for a few months, under the direction of a neighbouring minister. They are now anxiously considering the question of a permanent appointment, and hope to be able shortly to secure a suitable missionary for this important work. The annual sermons on behalf of the Mission will be preached at Cross-street Chapel on Sunday, April 21, by Mr. Street, the retiring missionary.

Newark.—A strenuous effort is being made to pay off the debt on the church. A local merchant has generously offered £20 towards that end, and a member of the congregation has given £5. On Monday a grand concert, with tableaux and a dramatic sketch, produced gratifying results.

Newcastle-on-Tyne.—On Easter Sunday the new organ of the Church of the Divine Unity was brought into use for the first time by the congregation. The organ has been bought from Councillor Robert Affleck, J.P., who undertook the duties of organist for the occasion. The organ, which is a remarkably fine instrument, was erected in a specially-constructed music room in the residence of Mr. Affleck, at Bloomfield, Gateshead, at a cost of considerably over £1,500, and he has generously sold it to the congregation for the nominal sum of £350. The removal and re-erection costing a further sum of £150. Nearly the whole of this sum has been raised by the congregation since the beginning of the year. In concluding his morning discourse, the Rev. Frank Walters said:—"My dear friends, by means of your generous gifts, our service of song in this church has been enriched by the finest music that art can provide. As your minister, I am grateful to you for this response to our appeal, and I am sure the collections will manifest the interest that the whole congregation takes in this good work. To-day I know that the desire of many hearts is fulfilled, and I count it a privilege to have been spared to take my part in the opening of our new organ. We now dedicate this organ to the greater glory of God, and to the service of the worshippers who meet within these walls. For years and years to come, when many of us have passed away, and long after the voice which now speaks to you is silent, may the strains of this organ still lead the worship of the One God, the Father of Spirits, in spirit and in truth. Amen." The special musical arrangements were in the hands of Alderman J. Barker Ellis, who for close upon forty years has acted as honorary choirmaster.

Portsmouth: St. Thomas's-street. — The annual tea and sacred concert took place on Good Friday in the chapel. About 100 friends took tea together, and several joined the party afterwards, an excellent programme being provided. Mr. T. Bond, who presided, thanked the willing workers, on behalf of the congregation, and all who in any way may have contributed to the meeting's success. He was pleased to find that they had the hearty good wishes of many friends who are kept from regular attendance by the long distance of their residences in the newer parts of the borough. A hearty invitation was given to those who do not attend another place of worship, to come and worship in that venerable sanctuary; while to visitors to this beautiful watering-place the right-hand of fellowship is always extended.

Saffron Walden.—On Good Friday, 5th inst., the sixty-fourth annual tea and public meeting was held in the General Baptist Chapel. It is by many years the oldest established tea in the town. Upwards of 100 persons sat down to tea, after which the public meeting commenced with singing and prayer, followed by a very varied programme, in which old and young took part. This year considerable use was made of the Sunday-school children in singing, recitations, and dialogues. The three Messengers of the General Baptist Assembly were present. The Rev. J. A. Brinkworth occupied the chair, and the Revs. W. H. Smith and A. J. Marchant addressed the meeting, as did Mr. H. Hockley, deacon of the Congregational Church. The chapel was full in every part, attention was intent, solos and choruses were well rendered, and the collection was helpful. The organist, Miss Brinkworth, was assisted by Miss Champ, and the meeting closed with singing and prayer.

Sheffield.—The fortnight's mission of the Unitarian Churches concluded on Thursday week with a service in the Vestry Hall, Attercliffe, conducted by the Rev. J. E. Manning and the Rev. J. Ellis, who gave an address on "The Leadership of Jesus." On Palm Sunday special services in Upper Chapel and Upperthorpe Chapel were largely attended, and on the following days services were held at Attercliffe. On Good Friday the Rev. J. Ellis preached at Upper Chapel on the Crucifixion, dwelling upon the death of Jesus as the supreme act of self-sacrifice completing the constant devotion of his life.

Walmsley.—On April 6, a Sale of Work, in aid of the chapel and school funds, was opened by Mr. Thomas Holt, Mayor of Bury. The Rev. E. Allen made a statement as to the object of the sale, and read a letter from the Rev. W. C. Atkinson, M.A., vicar of Walmsley, wishing success to the undertaking. The Rev. Morgan Jones gave an encouraging address. A vote of thanks to the Mayor was carried by acclamation. The Mayor, having given a very interesting address on early Nonconformity, afterwards declared the sale open. Buying and selling went on briskly all day, and also for several hours on Monday. At the close it was announced that there was a clear profit of £208 9s. 8d., a sum exceeding the expectations of the most sanguine.

ABERYSTWYTH

("The Biarritz of Wales")

Is highly recommended for invalids. It possesses the most equable temperature, its shore being swept by the Gulf Stream and the S.W. breezes of the Atlantic. The drainage is perfect, and the town is supplied with the purest water from Plynlimmon. LONDON DISTRICT UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

APRIL, 1901.

The President and Committee have learned with great regret that Mr. David Martineau has expressed his wish to be relieved of the duties of the Treasurership at the next Annual Meeting.

After Mr. Martineau's thirty years of untiring and devoted service, it is felt that the Committee have no claim to press him to continue in office. They are confident that all the members and friends of the Society would wish to mark their sense of his invaluable services in some signal manner; and they are assured that nothing would be more congenial to his own feelings than the raising of such a fund as would enable him to leave office without a deficiency on the Society's Balance Sheet.

The present debt of about £350 is the last accumulation of a series of heavy deficits which Mr. Martineau has cheerfully borne during his long period of office. In spite of the inadequacy of its resources, the Society has helped substantially in the establishment of no fewer than fifteen permanent congregations in that period; and the Treasurer's personal share in the work involved in this church-extension has been simply invaluable.

It should be explained that no grant has been available from the funds of the great Unitarian Bazaar, 1900 (the relief from that successful enterprise being strictly limited to paying off incumbrances on lands and buildings), but in future years some relief will indirectly be felt, owing to many congregations being relieved from burdens now weighing upon them.

The Committee feel, therefore, that an effort must now be made to raise the sum named, so that a fresh start may be made without incumbrance. Remittances may be made to Mr. H. Epps, 95, Upper Tulse Hill, S.W.

Signed on behalf of the Committee,

John T. Brunner, President.
H. Epps, Chairman of Executive Committee.
Arthur Titford, Chairman N. London Sub-Committee.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE report of the Executive Committee to the Council of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, which is published in full in our present issue, will, we trust, be widely read. It contains several points of special interest to which we desire to call attention—and first in the matter of finance. The report shows how much is done for the maintenance of religious work throughout the country, and those who have fullest knowledge of the condition of our churches and their many needs will be the first to bear testimony to the care and the true liberality of spirit with which the funds entrusted to the Association are administered. But the report draws attention to the fact that the estimated expenditure for the present year will not be met without an increase of some £200 or £300 of income. That should not be lacking from those who see the need and believe in the work.

IT will be welcome news to many of our readers that a new and cheaper edition of the two volumes of "Laws of Life after the Mind of Christ," by the late Rev. John Hamilton Thom, is in the press. These are sermons which, we are confident, are destined to remain classics of our religious literature. Their power and beauty, as interpreters of spiritual life, have been acknowledged by Roman Catholic and Protestant, by Orthodox and Heretic alike. "He who ministers here," said Dr. Martineau, in his Memorial Preface to the later volume of sermons, "is no priest of any altar made with hands, but a prophet of Him who is a Spirit, and communes with those whose worship is in spirit and in truth." We rejoice to think that by means of this new edition Mr. Thom's searching and inspiring words may now reach a new and greatly extended circle of hearers.

THE passage of the report which refers to work in India will be read with the utmost sympathy by the many friends of the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams. The tributes to the value of the work done by Mr. Williams in India during the past three years have been most gratifying. His religious services and his literary lectures in Calcutta and in other cities have evoked the warmest response, and keen regret is expressed that his services in India cannot be continued. Next September would have completed his third year; but climate and hard work have told seriously on Mr. Williams's health and he has wisely determined to return home at once. It will be seen from the report that he hopes to reach home by the end of May. Communications for Mr. Williams should be addressed to Essex Hall.

THE fact that a new and revised edition of the "Essex Hall Hymnal" is in course of preparation has already been announced in these columns, and the active interest of our readers has been invited. Correspondents who have suggestions to make, or wishes to express, should address them to the Hymn-book Sub-Committee at Essex Hall.

AMONG our guests at the meeting of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers in Whit-week is to be a representative of the Mennonites of Holland. The Rev. Dr. F. C. Fleischer, of Broek op Langendijk, is pastor of one of the 127 congregations of that most interesting body now existing in Holland, the large majority of whom are distinctly liberal in their modes of thought. The movement had its origin in early Reformation days among the Anabaptists of Zürich, whence it rapidly spread into Germany, Holland, and France. Its adherents laid the chief stress not on dogma, but on the discipline of life, and formed themselves into independent communities, strictly separated from the world, refusing even civic duties. Hence they were persecuted by Protestants and Catholics alike. They received the name by which they have since been known from Menno Simons (1492-1559), a native of Witmarsum, in Friesland, who, after having served as a priest in his native town, joined these seekers after a separate life of holiness, and by his earnest and lovable nature, rather than by any special power of intellectual leadership, exerted a widespread influence, maintained after his death by his writings.

THE Mennonites are largely represented in America, and especially in Pennsylvania, having strong affinities with the Quakers. They are chiefly an agricultural people, known for their sterling character, intelligence, and philanthropy. The refusal to bear arms brought upon their communities settled in Russia persecution, which in 1871 led to the emigration of large numbers to America. In Holland the body has held together, and numbers close upon 50,000 members. They still refuse the oath, but during the past century their attitude towards civic duties and military service seems to have been modified. Their principles of tolerance in matters of belief and emphasis on character engage for the Mennonites our warmest sympathy, and Dr. Fleischer may be assured of a most cordial welcome. We shall look forward with the greatest pleasure to gaining from him fuller knowledge of his religious community.

THE death of Professor Auguste Sabatier, Dean of the Protestant Faculty of Theology in Paris, is a great loss to liberal religious thought. M. Sabatier was not more than sixty-two years of age, in the height of his powers. "A French Peasant," as the Christian World tells us he loved to call himself, Sabatier studied theology at Montauban, and in 1866 was nominated to the chair of Theology in the Protestant Faculty of Strasburg. After the Franco-German war he declined the offer of the German authorities that he should retain his chair, and removed to Paris, where in 1877 the Protestant Faculty was definitely established, with Sabatier at its head. As a student of the Origins of Christianity, an interpreter of the philosophy of religion and of dogma in the light of modern thought, Professor Sabatier rendered brilliant service, and it is with the deepest regret that we record his death.

ON Wednesday there was an unseemly demonstration in the church of St. Mary-le-Bow, Cheapside, when the election of Dr. Winnington Ingram as Bishop of London, in succession to the late Dr. Creighton, was confirmed. The objectors, of whom the chief were Mr. John Kensit and the Rev. R. C. Fillingham, vicar of Hexton, amid noisy demonstrations and counter-demonstrations, charged the Bishop-elect with unfaithfulness to his vow as a member of a Protestant church, but every objection was over-ruled by Sir J. P. Deane, the Vicar-General, who said that he was bound by precedent. The new Bishop then took the oath of allegiance. The election is nominally by the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's, and at the opening of the proceedings the King's "assent" to the election was read. On the other hand, in meeting the objectors to the election, the Vicar-General more accurately declared: "It is an act of the Sovereign."

The Liberation Society's Nineteenth Triennial Conference will be held in London, at the Memorial Hall, April 30 and May 1. The first sitting will be presided over by Mr. Carvell Williams, in virtue of the fact that he is one of the few survivors of the Conference of 1844, in which the Society originated. The chairman of the second sitting will be Mr. J. E. Ellis, M.P., a member of the Society of Friends. It is understood that the Conference will embrace national education, the Irish University question, the renewal of the doles to the clergy, sacerdotalism in the Establishment, and the demand for self-government in the Church without disestablishment. The Conference proceedings will close with the usual public meeting at the City Temple on Wednesday evening, May 1. The chair is to be taken by Mr. Thomas Shaw, the late Solicitor-General for Scotland; and addresses will be delivered by Dr. Clifford, Mr. Lloyd George, M.P., and the Rev. Morgan Gibbon.

A correspondent has sent us an advertisement which appeared in the Standard of the 10th inst. announcing a lecture on "Coming Prophetic Events," and concluding with an offer of explanatory pamphlets to anyone who would write to "Propheticus" at Essex Hall. This troubled our correspondent, as seeming to associate the Hall with these particular views. Essex Hall is, of course, let for a great variety of purposes, and views of many kinds are propounded from its platform by the hirers. But "Propheticus" was not authorised to use that address for his correspondence.

A New Century appeal, in the interest of Unitarianism in Wales, has been issued, signed by the Rev. R. J. Jones, of Aberdare (chairman); Mr. Lewis N. Williams, president of the South Wales Unitarian Association; Mr. N. Woolcott Thompson, president of the South-East Wales Unitarian Society; Mr. D. J. Jones, 29, Hirwain-road, Aberdare (treasurer); Mr. G. Carslake Thompson, and the Revs. J. E. Jenkins, J. H. Davies, and D. J. Williams (secretary), 3, Brynteg-terrace, Merthyr Tydvil. The appeal, having referred to recent changes in religious thought and the claims of a new century, proceeds:—

Under these circumstances, we, as Unitarians, recognise the new era as offering us a unique opportunity to bear our witness to the essential need of religion as a vital principle of our humanity. A living religious faith alone can sustain us amid the sins and sorrows, the trials and disappointments incident to the vicissitudes of our present life.

The Welsh Unitarians accordingly avail themselves of this opportunity of making their first general appeal for help to consolidate and spread their faith in the Principality. We earnestly entreat every Unitarian in Wales to rise to the occasion, and each individual Church to take the matter up heartily, and try to enlist the sympathies of every man, woman, and child, to cooperate in making this movement a success.

While thus appealing directly to Welsh Unitarians, we also hope that with their usual generosity our English friends will render us substantial help to raise the sum we are aiming at; without such help we can hardly expect to succeed.

It is hoped to raise at least £3,000, and the fund is to be vested in a representative body of Trustees, who will have discretion in applying it to the liquidation of chapel debts, or to the support in other ways of movements in Wales for the spread of the principles of Unitarianism.

The Temperance Critic (twopence monthly) appears as "an organ of Constructive Reform." It would have appeared with a better grace without the brag over its title on the cover, "A Sane Temperance (not Teetotal) Paper." The Critic is an advocate of moderation and a reformed public-house. The experiments of the Bishop of Chester's scheme and the People's Refreshment House Association are commended for careful consideration, and the general position is stated in the following terms:—

The old headlong frontal attack on drink and the Trade—magnificent in its earnestness and seriousness of purpose—must be exchanged for movements and dispositions which will assuredly terminate in restricting the Trade to its due sphere. It is useless, if not worse, to go on asking a people which drinks alcoholic liquors to the extent of £162,000,000 a year to "prohibit" itself from so doing—because, on the one hand, the temperate consumers (the enormous majority) will never be persuaded that they are doing wrong in indulging in a necessary or a luxury; and because, on the other hand, the intemperate can only be won at present by individual moral and religious work. A Prohibition policy merely (1) consolidates for political purposes the Trade itself, and (2) transforms the relation of buyer and seller into a political alliance. But we can count upon the co-operation of the temperate in measures to improve the dwellings, the education, the amusements, the conditions of labour of those who are most liable to intemperance; and we can count upon at least the passive acceptance of an improved environment by the latter. Nay, the very members of the Trade itself, as a rule generous and kindly people, will be with us here. If the forces of Temperance are to win great victories, it will be by recognising the nature and extent of the territory to be invaded, occupied, and reformed, and by adapting and proportioning all the available forces to the wisest methods of co-operation and support.

Those who believe in the "sanity" of total abstinence, no less than other "moderate" reformers, will give the heartiest support to every effort to improve the environment and enrich the interests of those who are most sorely tried by the temptations to excessive drinking, while they remain none the less clearly convinced that both for health and intelligence and permanent happiness in life, total abstinence is best.

They say there is nothing which communicates itself so quickly amongst the members of a family, as an expression of coldness or discontent on the face of one of its members. It is like the frost that chills us. That is not altogether true; there is something which is communicated with equal rapidity, and greater force—I mean the smiling face, the beaming countenance, the happy heart.—Gold Dust.

The Ministers' Institute.—The sixth meeting of the Institute was held at Manchester College, Oxford, on April 15 to 17. On Monday evening a Communion service was held, conducted by the Revs. R. A. Armstrong and V. D. Davis. On Tuesday morning a devotional meeting was conducted by the Revs. W. Whitaker and Dr. Warschauer, after which a conference was held, the Rev. J. E. Odgers in the chair, when the Rev. Dr. Drummond gave an address on "The Use and Meaning of the Term, The Son of Man, in the Gospels." In the evening a social meeting was held, when Mrs. Drummond received the members and friends. On Wednesday morning the devotional meeting was conducted by the Rev. C. B. Upton, followed by a conference, Professor Upton in the chair; papers on "Christian Theism" were read by the Revs. C. T. Poynting and Dr. Mellone. In the afternoon the business meeting was held, and the new committee were elected. At 3 o'clock the closing service was conducted by the Rev. Dr. Drummond. The Institute was much indebted to Mr. A. F. Kerry, M.A., the College organist, for his services at the organ.

CHRISTIANITY THE RELIGION OF THE INCARNATION.

Sir,—Everyone interested in this discussion must feel grateful to Mr. Armstrong for participating in it; for my own part, I venture to express to him my sincere thanks for his clear and definite statement of a position of which he is so distinguished a representative.

May I, before coming to the main point, clear away one or two less important misunderstandings to which I must have laid myself open through inadvertence? When I referred to a certain manner of regarding Christ as a "tendency" of Unitarian thought, I did so without any remotest intention of disrespect. Mr. Armstrong no doubt speaks from a knowledge wider than mine can possibly be when he says that this way of looking upon Christ—namely, merely as a great ethical and spiritual teacher—is a "fulfilled achievement of Unitarian thought." I willingly withdraw the word which he thinks misdescribes the actual state of affairs; while, on the other hand, I am assured by letter upon letter which I have received during the last few weeks that we are not by any means all "Parkerites now."

Let me also assure Mr. Armstrong that nothing was, or is, further from my mind than to "rebuke," or pass "condemnation" upon, those who do not hold the views to which I have given expression; I have not so learnt my Unitarianism. In return, I may, perhaps, assume that Mr. Armstrong does not really credit me with the sentiment "that any of us should adopt a given view of Christ for any other reason than that to our inmost mind and conscience it approves itself as true." It is because, and only because, I hold certain views to be true that I anticipate better results from their adoption than have attended the wide adoption of certain other views.

But these are secondary matters. What I am really concerned about is to dispel the impression to which Mr. Armstrong gives currency, and which I find prevailing in many quarters, that the view of Christ and Christianity which I have enunciated is one "which has lately appeared amongst us"—a kind of latter-day minor heresy which has sprung up among certain young and unknown ministers. Permit me to quote the following passage, expressing the mature opinions of no less a man than Martineau, and taken from no more inaccessible source than the "Hours of Thought":—

"Godlike qualities, being simply intense in beauty and not mathematically large, can glow within the human limits as clearly as in the scale of infinitude. If there is to be any expression of the Divine character at all, it can only be through the lineaments of an individual soul, passing through a concrete and particular life. . . . A visible person entirely holy, living and dying in simple trust and pure obedience, loving nothing but what is dear to God. . . . A being of sweet and tender humanities, yet transfigured with the intimate converse of Divine realities—a spirit, in short, as grand and gracious as that of Jesus—bears down upon us with a persuasion which neither the whispers of our natural heart nor the thunders of supernatural power can ever exorcise. Such a one stands openly between our thought and God. . . . Whom else could He send to show us the approaches to Himself, and set us in the true direction for the highest of all? . . . Such a mediatorial mind . . . becomes to us an objective Revelation, scattering our doubts of God, and giving authoritative truth to the faint oracles of our better selves."—("Christ, the Divine Word," part II.).

Now, Sir, Martineau is not a fetish or an infallible oracle; but when it is attempted—in all good faith—mildly to disparage certain opinions as being only a novel kind of fad that has lately sprung up and therefore is of no particular significance, it becomes legitimate to point out, and even to insist, that these opinions have at least the sanction and authority of one who is universally revered amongst us, and looked upon as our teacher par excellence. If Unitarians will in plain words repudiate Dr. Martineau's views of Christ, let the repudiation be made, and the world will know where we stand; but do not let them go on burning incense to him, while at the same time they depreciate an attitude toward Christianity which may be quite wrong, but which certainly was his.

I entirely concur with Mr. Armstrong when he expresses his "glad conviction that through many other agencies [besides Christ] we have divinely proffered means of access to God." What I say is that Christ is immeasurably the chief of these means—that it was his mission, in a supreme degree, to "show us the Father"—and that we have largely failed to avail ourselves of this particular channel, with such consequences as might be expected. My position is summed up in the familiar and beautiful words of our liturgy (Third Service): "As disciples of Jesus Christ, Thy Son, and with great love to him, we would come to Thee; may it be also in his spirit. We would be mindful how far off from Thee we should have been without him, and how near to Thee he will lead us, if we humbly and steadfastly yield ourselves up to his guidance."

I cannot give Mr. Armstrong chapter and verse for the use among us of the phrase "the humanity of God aud the divinity of man." I am under the impression that I have heard and seen it used a good deal, but, since it has not come under Mr. Armstrong's experience, I assume that I must be mistaken.

My difference with Mr. Lloyd concerning the Incarnation having narrowed itself down to a merely verbal one, it remains for me only to express satisfaction that this is so. We can "agree to differ" on the suitability of a term, since we are so nearly in accord on the doctrine itself.

Mr. Nield is unnecessarily alarmed, and in his alarm forgets—may I say it in all kindness—that Unitarians do not "protest" against each other's views. Mine are not binding on him; there is room for us both in our Free Churches. But I certainly believe that God gave us in Christ a special, exceptional revelation of Himself, and—again with Martineau (v.s.)—hold to the mediatorial capacity of Christ.

Mr. Armstrong is proud to belong to a religious fellowship which can embrace opinions so divergent as his and mine. May I not say, quite simply, how proud I am to belong to a religious community of which Mr. Armstrong is so eminent an ornament? J. Warschauer.

April 15.

P.S.—Since writing the above, I have received a note from the Rev. T. L. Marshall, kindly informing me that the phrase "Unitarianism stands for the Humanity of God and the Divinity of man" appeared as motto on the title-leaf of the "Unitarian Almanac for 1889." Mr. Marshall adds: "It certainly appeared in more than one of the annual almanacs, and was often quoted in speeches, &c., of that date as something very fine."

Sir,—Echoing Mr. Armstrong's tribute to the inclusive breadth of our religious fellowship, may I add a word on the main subject. In these days, when the whole trend of scientific and philosophical thought is in the direction of the unity and universality of the laws and methods by which God governs all things, is it not retrogressive rather than progressive, to hark back to a belief in the special and unique, whether in the personality of Jesus or elsewhere? Allege that, and where are we to stop? The necessity for a unique revelation implies the failure of previous and more general efforts on the part of God, and carries with it the whole orthodox conception of a fallen world and a supernatural redemption.

The great glory of Unitarian theology has been its growing harmony with the revelations of science and history. It has seen and gladly acknowledged degrees of spiritual grandeur in various teachers and revealers, and has affirmed its supreme indebtedness to Jesus; but it has increasingly refused to set him apart in another category, and to isolate him from other Sons of God. Are we to perform a right-about-face now, and to march back into the catastrophic conception of religion?

As to the impossibility of a living Christian Church without such a volte face, I seem to have read of a Church of the Living God, which appears to me a grander and wider reality than any Church dependent on a correct theory of the Incarnation.

H. W. Hawkes.

Sir,—Leaving the main discussion to the original combatants, I should like to offer a respectful comment on the remark that it is a fulfilled achievement of Unitarian thought to make Christ no more than a great ethical and spiritual teacher. I have been accustomed to hear this flung against us as a taunt by our orthodox critics—a taunt which in private and in public I have felt it my duty to repudiate and refute. It is, unfortunately, all too easy to misunderstand each other's use of words, and if we were to explain all we mean by a great teacher we should probably find that we understand by the term incalculably more than a mere retailer of moral and religious maxims, more than a mere instructor in ethical and spiritual truths. We should have to admit that a teacher to be great must be more than teacher; he must be a living exemplar of the truths he teaches. We should probably have to go still further, and acknowledge that he must be more even than an exemplar; he must possess that subtle secret of life whereby he is able to communicate his own eager enthusiasm to his pupils, and so awaken in their consciousness the identical ideals that dominate his own. To me, at least, it seems that a really great teacher is not only a way, not only a truth, but also a life. Now, it is just this fact that in Christ we have an ethical and spiritual life which, through love of him, may be personally appropriated and assimilated—it is just this that we so often miss. And if we lose this, what doth it profit to gain all teaching and all knowledge? If Christ were a mere pattern set over against us for us to copy and imitate, he would still be a picture of exquisite beauty—a statue of infinite loveliness and grace. But as such he could never pass into us the saving energy of his own victorious soul. He does that by virtue of his being more than a mere teacher, more than a mere exemplar — namely, by being a living principle, a vivifying spirit, an energising power, a personality who, through the communion of love, becomes operative in our lives to purify and gladden them with "the joy of the Lord."

There is, indeed, only one way in which we can make the spirit of another our own: that way is the way of love. By love we mingle our life with the life of our friend. Words of greeting, touch of hand, kiss of lips are symbols, and all these are external. But love penetrates and transfigures the soul, and enables Christ, who dwells invisibly in the invisible God, to make his abode among men, touching them into the beauty and grace of his own life of Sonship. So long as he remains a mere teacher, or a cold statuesque pattern outside our lives, the fulness of his saving and redeeming power cannot reach us. But by love he becomes more than a dead Rabbi; he dwells as a "real presence," as a living Christ, in the hearts of the faithful. In the communion of love he abides with us, makes his home with us, sups with us; and if we had walked the fields of Galilee with him, if we had touched his hands and looked unto his mortal eyes, he could have dwelt with us in no other way.

We may be as unorthodox as we please—neither orthodoxy nor unorthodoxy availeth anything—but woe unto us if we fail to bring to the hearts of men Christ as a present living Reality, and convince them that at the very lowest estimate he is to the disciple what Nature is to the poet, what a saintly mother or wise father is to a child—a Mediator, a Revealer, a Saviour, a Power that discloses the Divine Love, and awakens in our consciousness the Divine Life. A WARNING.

Sir,—A man is going about who, in order to obtain "a little assistance," makes free use of the name of a well-known Lancashire minister. The man says he has been in Africa and lost his health, and, since returning to this country, has been in the Convalescent Home at Southport. Sometimes he has been seeking work in Southport. He is on his way to join his family, who reside now in Manchester, now in Bolton. The minister whose name he uses knows absolutely nothing of him.

COUNTRY HOLIDAY MOVEMENT.

Sir,—With the approach of the summer months our thoughts turn again to the Children's Holidays in the country. We remember with pleasure the sight of the little brown faces that returned home, and the recital of their novel experiences; the hampers of apples and the bunches of flowers which came as true country gifts to the London homes.

We feel therefore no hesitation in asking permission to again make our appeal to your readers for funds to carry on the work this year. Last summer, owing principally to the numerous appeals for money for different causes, our subscription list was not so large as usual, and although not quite so many children were sent away as in the previous year, there was an increased expenditure in railway fare, owing to the difficulty in getting country homes near London.

As a result, therefore, we start with a considerably smaller balance in hand than usual. We hope that this year all kind friends will renew their contributions.

I beg to acknowledge, with many thanks, receipt of £3 3s., already kindly sent by Mr. Hugh Martineau, and shall be glad to receive any further subscriptions.

LITERATURE.

THE CERTAINTY OF THE GOSPEL.*

Mr. Robinson, who, while parish minister of Kilmun, wrote a book which, for a time, caused great stir, has just issued another book upon a similar theme, but probably without anticipating a similar result. For he is now (as the title-page tells us) minister of the Independent congregation at Crieff. Readers may remember that, when his former work lay under condemnation as heretical, something like a retractation took place; but there is a certain satisfaction in learning that Mr. Robinson has been delivered from the house of bondage, and that he can now with freedom speak what he thinks.

The present "sketch" deals with the "certainty of the Gospel." It starts with the assumptions that the human mind may perceive the Eternal Being, and that the Gospel comes in such a perception as assures the soul that God is wholly loving to all His creatures. Mr. Robinson adopts the position that "revelation" of God exists wherever and by whatever means His divine character and will become evident to the soul. That frame of mind which has for so many generations tended to limit the sphere of "revelation" to the records of the Bible he calls "Literalism," and he justly charges it with having greatly hindered the true evangelising of the world.

In particular, the author points to the terrible thoughts which have prevailed with respect to the so-called "revealed truth" of everlasting damnation. It is, happily, no new thing for a writer who remains in touch with communities regarding themselves as "orthodox" to raise his voice in protest against such thoughts, as being no true "revelation" of the divine nature and will. Nor is such a writer very exceptional when he protests against traditional views of the atonement. We may best indicate Mr. Robinson's way of looking at things by a quotation in this connection. He says (pp. 84-6):—

> Many who have perceived by means of Literalism have made the atonement itself appear to be a new barrier between us and God. Perceiving, to begin with, ourselves alone in nearness, and God only in the distance, they have maintained that the atonement is dependent on an acceptance by our wills of an elaborate scheme, partly metaphysical. And they have not been slow to add that a rejection of this scheme is more wicked in the sight of God than all other moral corruption. Thus, their first article of religion is that our unworthy condition is an impassable barrier between us and the Almighty, their second that the removal of the barrier waits on an intricate act by our unworthy selves, which failing, in the case of any individual, the barrier is established, beyond hope in earth or heaven. . . . They see not God above all, and they forbid us to see Him. They would rob us of the assurance conveyed by His voice continually, that He loves us as we are, feeble as we are. They see ourselves only, and project the life of God into the unknown. From the dread amazement which their doctrine induces, the refuge for every one is in the Brightness of Goodness that is in verity the Sovereign Soul, approached through humble supplication. In God Himself is the atonement; and in Him, preceding both our estrangement and the atonement, is an adorable, infallible Care.

In support and illustration of the contention that the soul can and does perceive the Eternal through occurrences in time and space, the author sketches the history of Israel's religion, leading up to the great revelation of the divine in Christ and emerging in the mysticism of St. Paul. The subtle growth of Literalism is traced, a growth already begun when the "Gospels" were written, but reaching its consummation only when Protestantism, in its haste to be free of the corruptions of Rome, deprived itself of the safeguarding thought of a continuous revelation through the Church. Mr. Robinson, like all sober minds, freely acknowledges the efficacy of the Bible as a storehouse of religious teaching; but he acts wisely in endeavouring to reassure Scotchmen by notable examples among their own writers—such as Erskine, Campbell, and Scott—that the illumination of the human mind is not limited to one age or method. He holds that philosophy was wise when, after the searching scepticism of the eighteenth century, it returned to the Platonic view that the eternal reality underlies the transient forms apparent to our senses; and in the writings of Hegel and Schleiermacher he finds the clue by which the individual soul can reach certainty of its inseparable connection with God.

The volume is not a large one, but it will be seen that it deals with the greatest of subjects in a serious if not wholly adequate way. On laying it down the wish is irresistible that the author may in any future essay address himself to some one section of an inquiry which, in trying, as here, to be philosophical, critical, and historical all at once, leaves the reader with a feeling of having grasped at much and retained little. OBITUARY.

MRS. BROOKE HERFORD.

Miss Hannah Hankinson, afterwards Mrs. Brooke Herford, was born in Manchester (Aug. 6, 1823), close to a great mill of which her father was one of the managers. She was educated at the best preparatory school in Manchester, that of Miss Holland; and thus in her early life the two streams met which never parted—familiarity with the cares and wants of poor people, and a vivid share in the intellectual interests open to those of larger means and more abundant leisure. And it became the passion of her early life to make the privileges which she herself so keenly appreciated the means of brightening and uplifting the lives of workers in the great industrial hive. A girl of her powers and tastes would in these days be naturally expected to become a High School mistress; in those days she was expected to be a governess. But when a mistress was needed for the Ashtons' factory school at Flowery Field Miss Hankinson saw her opportunity and eagerly applied for the position. "She will never stay," said Mr. Thomas Ashton; for it was then far more remarkable than it would be now for any one with the education of a lady to seek such an appointment. But she did stay; and year after year she threw herself into the work with the ardour which distinguished her through life. She had a rare sympathy with children and insight into their nature, for she had much of the child-nature herself — directness, simplicity, loyalty, and sensitiveness to evil without suspiciousness. Her work was based, as all the best work for and with children must be, on respect for them and confidence in them as well as love. But her influence reached far beyond the children themselves. She was determined to make the schoolroom a centre of happiness and interest, and an uplifting power in the neighbourhood. She got friends to give lectures in the schoolroom, and by-and-bye, with the aid of Mr. Gaskell, Mr. Charles Beard and others, she started evening services, and was thus the true foundress of what afterwards grew into the Flowery Field Church.

But while thus making a new spiritual home for others in Flowery Field, she herself still felt drawn to the old associations of Cross-street Chapel and Lower Mosley-street schools, her own religious home. And it was there that an attachment grew up between Miss Hankinson and Brooke Herford, then a student at Manchester New College. Some years afterwards, when he had settled at Todmorden, she became his wife. Their wedding was at Hale Chapel, June 22, 1852, and was the first to be solemnised in that old chapel. Thenceforth at Todmorden, at Sheffield, at Strangeways, at Chicago, in Boston, and at Hampstead she shared her husband's joys and sorrows, took, as the woman always must take, the heaviest share in the struggles and privations of early days, and reaped (not only vicariously) a full measure of the honours and the triumphs of later times. Though singularly unobtrusive in her work, and never directly asserting or appearing to impress herself, she had a wonderful gift for organisation, a happy inventiveness and instinct for the practical thing to aim at, and the right moment at which to suggest it. Her large class of young women at Todmorden felt her influence throughout their lives. Nay, there were pupils of an earlier period yet, pupils of sixty years ago, who gathered in tears by her graveside.

In Manchester and in other scenes of her husband's labours, she reorganised all the special work undertaken by the ladies of the congregation, consolidated the various societies, and gave fresh energy and clearer purpose to their work. In the early days of trained nursing she had the superintendence of a district in Greengate, and still further extended her knowledge of the most destitute classes in Manchester; and with her knowledge her sympathy ever grew. In Chicago, faithful to her old traditions, she was instrumental in founding the first free kindergarten, which is still prospering and bears her name. It was in consequence of a paper which she wrote when on a visit from America to England that the Postal Mission was founded here; and her papers on women's work in connection with our congregations will be long remembered, and their results still longer felt.

From her girlhood, too, she was a keen politician; and the enthusiasm that set her collecting signatures to the "Monster Petition" and working for the repeal of the Corn Laws, and that afterwards enlisted her efforts for Civil Service reform in America, remained with her to the end.

In her later years, even when her activities were reduced to the narrowest limits by declining health, she occupied a unique position of influence, and was often thought of as the ideal minister's wife; but she herself would have repudiated, with something like indignation, the implications of such a phrase. She had found in the position that was hers, as she would have found in any other position, the means of giving practical shape to the tastes, the convictions, and the aspirations of her life; but she would never admit that the causes to which she was so devoted had a claim upon a minister's wife as such, and she would never allow her example to be made a reproach to others whose tastes or gifts did not lead them to tread her path. The minister's wife who, when asked, "What is your view of your pastoral charge?" answered, "The charge of the pastor," would have found no more sturdy champion than Mrs. Herford. She herself had a wider pastoral charge as well, but that was because she was herself a born shepherdess.

Her own domestic cares and responsibilities were for very many years of a nature which to most women would have been more than sufficient reason for declining any public duty. Her large family and at first restricted means, and her determination not to be a spiritual clog on her husband, or to force unduly upon him the necessity of taking worldly considerations into account, made life often weigh heavy on her. But it never quelled her elastic and cheerful spirit, or her pride and joy in her home and in her work; nor did it ever close her heart to claims beyond the domestic circle. "It was a beautiful and wonderful home, in times of difficulty and times of ease alike, in all its inward harmony, and in its generous and open welcome and hospitality to all around." So says one who knew it well, and knew it long. Mrs. Herford had the power of making friends feel so perfectly at their ease that her house was a home to many besides her children. Her quaint sayings, her quick sympathy, her almost universal interest in everything that concerns human life, on the large scale or the small, her deep and simple practical wisdom, and her bright unfailing faith made themselves felt in an almost impersonal manner. She seemed to be quietly looking on and sharing rather than originating them, and many a one who loved her and was loved by her would find it almost impossible to give any personal characterisation of her. Her friends remember sharing all kinds of good and helpful experiences with her, and remember her racy comments on them. They remember that she was there on all kinds of occasions, and hardly realise that it was she who made them.

Yet, to the inmost circle of all, her personality was deeply, vividly, and directly felt. To her children as they grew up she was always a support and an opportunity, never a restraint or a rebuke; a store of wisdom and of knowledge, but with a mind as open as the heavens. In answer to an appeal against some new fashion so unlike "the way in which we were brought up," she said quite recently: "Well, some people worship the past; I don't. I reverence the past, I respect the present, and I trust the future." In these words she unconsciously wrote her own biography, and with them let her stamp her own seal upon these poor notes. It was to this temper that she owed that greatest happiness of a mother, the remaining in perfect touch with her children after they came into possession of their own lives.

The parent hen amid her brood,
Though fledged and feathered, and well pleased to part
And straggle from her presence, still a brood,
And she herself from the maternal bond
Still undischarged; yet doth she little more
Than move with them in tenderness and love,
A centre to the circle which they make.

There is one left to mourn her to whom the thoughts of every reader of these words, in America and in England, will turn; but silence must speak the sympathy that dare not harden into printed words.

MRS. T. CHATFEILD CLARKE.

We deeply regret to record the death of Mrs. Thomas Chatfeild Clarke, which took place at her London residence, on Monday, April 15. The deceased lady, who was in her seventy-sixth year, was the third daughter of the late Mr. John Sutton Nettlefold, of Highgate. Her mother was a sister of the late Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, father of the Colonial Secretary. In her early womanhood she took a keen interest in the Carter-lane Mission, and she retained her interest, all through life, in the work of its successor at Blackfriars, and in the other London Domestic Missions, towards whose benevolent operations she was always a generous friend. In 1859 she was married to the late Mr. Thomas Chatfeild Clarke, a past President of the Surveyors' Institution, and of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association; the Rev. Robert Aspland performed the ceremony. They had a family of seven sons, six of whom survive their parents. Although Mrs. Chatfeild Clarke loyally supported her husband in his public work, her special delight was in her own home in the midst of her family. In London, and particularly at Wotton Common, Isle of Wight, she found constant pleasure in the simple duties and pursuits of home-life. In the village near Oakfield, she was beloved by the people among whom she lived for her unfailing kindness of heart and generosity of hand in case of sickness or need. Only those who were privileged to enter or who belonged to the family circle knew how affectionate and tender she was in all her thoughts and ways. Her Isle of Wight home, with its gardens and farm, was a source of never-failing interest and delight which she rejoiced, when opportunity offered, to share with others. Since the death of her husband, her health had not been very robust, but the loving thoughtful constant care bestowed upon her by her sons at home brought to her closing years joy and peace, and reverent thankfulness. On Friday morning, the Rev. F. K. Freeston conducted a brief religious service at Essex Church, and the interment took place at Highgate cemetery.

THE REV. WILLIAM BINNS.

The funeral of the late Rev. William Binns took place on Wednesday week at the Blackpool Cemetery, the service being conducted by the Rev. S. A. Steinthal. The service was attended by the Mayor of Blackpool and other members of the Corporation, and of various societies with which Mr. Binns was connected, and there was a representative gathering of his brother ministers and other friends. Mr. Steinthal delivered an address of consolation and affectionate appreciation, based on a friendship of nearly forty-three years, in the course of which he said:—"Among his brother ministers there have been some as widely read in literature and some more deeply versed in classic scholarship, in natural history, or in theology, but among his contemporaries there have been very few, if any, gifted as he was with occasional inspirations of genius, which made his utterances at times glow with pure prophetic fire. It was not, however, this high intellectual attainment, which has won for him the warm feeling which those who knew him best most entertained for him. His tender sympathy and loving heart were ever ready to pour out their beneficent and humane gifts, sharing in the joys and sorrows of his fellow-men. The devout religiousness which animated his whole life made him a welcome visitor among the sorrowing and a no less welcome guest among the happy. He had learned the message of glad things which Jesus brought from his Heavenly Father, and he knew how to make that gospel reach and bless the hearts of others.

"We have differed from one another at times very widely on grave matters. But I never doubted his sincerity or the conscientiousness which animated him; and when he seemed to me to be most in error or to make his worst mistake, I was always sure that he meant well, though he might fail to achieve his aim. Remembering how he had worked for twenty-seven years independently before he began the systematic training of his rich gifts, it is not to be wondered that he failed at times to show under any circumstances a complete compliance with the usages of society, and may at times have offended against what are regarded as good manners. But in comparison with his good qualities, his high character, his pure and noble worth, his faults were small indeed and sink into nothingness. Thankful must we be to have been allowed for so many years to have known and loved one who so won our admiration; who so richly abounded in the blessings and gifts of God which show and reveal the life eternal which comes through Jesus the Christ of God. That which is mortal with its weaknesses and failures passes away, but that which comes from God abideth for ever. There is for him, whose loss we to-day so deeply deplore, the dawn of an unending Easter festival. We thank God, although with tearful hearts, that our dear friend is called to enter into the joy of his Lord."

REMINISCENCES.

The Rev. John Fox, of Hunslet, writing as an old friend who knew Mr. Binns in his younger days, sends us some interesting reminiscences, from which we must be content to take the following extracts:—

"I first saw and heard him when probably he was still among the Methodists, and certainly before he entertained the idea of entering the Unitarian ministry. This must have been in my early teens. The occasion was a temperance meeting in the Wesleyan schoolroom of my native village, where I myself grew up under Methodist influences. There were two young men on that platform, one of whom was said by a preceding speaker to be able to do anything (presumably in the way of speaking), while the other was able to do everything. One of these was William Binns. He was then in appearance little more than a beardless youth. Yet he justified the statement which had been made concerning him. He spoke for most of an hour in the most fluent manner, without the least hesitation and without a single note. Yet he gave one the impression that he spoke memoriter, and this is what I have heard from others, that after a great speech he was able to hand over the MS. to the representatives of the Press. And this testifies to his wonderful memory which was richly stored with the treasures of literature, and which stood him in such good stead both in his written and spoken word."

"When the West Riding Village Mission Society was started he was one of its first lay-preachers, and I might also say, the ablest. He soon established a reputation by the ability and brilliance of his sermons. He became most popular both as a preacher and a platform speaker, for these were his Temperance days. I, along with three congenial companions, all converts to Unitarianism, frequently went to hear him in other places on a Sunday evening—once, I remember, to a village four or five miles distant in the dark and on lonely roads. I felt the stimulus of his utterances, and his very name became an inspiration to my youthful mind.

"Since those days it has always been a pleasure to me to listen to his speech, as it has been to many thousands besides. Whether grave or gay, humorous or serious, people always looked to him for something original, some rich intellectual treat. And they were seldom disappointed. Even when he raised their antagonisms, as he frequently did, there was a fascination about him which they could not resist. He was a born fighter. He loved controversy, and he possessed the qualities which make the intellectual gladiator. He had a dauntless courage, a fluent tongue, a ready wit, and a sparkling humour. I have seen him in many encounters, sometimes in deadly earnest, when the most influential forces were arrayed against him. It was well known that he was a foeman worthy of the sharpest steel, and woe be to that man who entered the lists against him and indulged in dangerous metaphors, for they were almost sure to be turned against him to his own confusion. His humour often took very grim forms of expression. In his lighter moods his play of wit and humour often called forth roars of laughter. He could strike hard blows, but their force was often tempered by the good-natured humour with which they were given.

"I quite agree with the suggestion that his printed sermons, essays, &c., might well be collected into a memorial volume which would hand on his message to posterity."

Another correspondent, who was a member of the Birkenhead congregation in the earlier days of Mr. Binns' ministry there, writes enthusiastically of the influence of his preaching, and, above all, of the power of his prayers, which attained the loftiest spiritual heights, expressing a regret that there was no Rufus Leighton present to preserve those utterances, as was done in the case of Theodore Parker. Speaking also of the time when Mr. Binns had returned from Devonport to Birkenhead, when he was at the height of his powers, our correspondent writes:—

"His annual lecture on the Death Roll of the preceding year was always eagerly looked for. On one occasion I remember, after summing up the history of many noted men, he concluded, with a twinkle in his eye, by naming an old man who had been in the habit of sitting in the front pew and singing very loudly, and who had passed away to his rest. It was at this time that he founded the Shakespearian Society which obtained quite a local reputation.

"I asked him once how long he took to prepare his sermons: he said from two to three hours if he read them; but double that time when he preached extempore. It is well to have this evidence from a man of so much native eloquence of the necessity for preparation in extempore discourses.

"Some of his most inspiring sermons were on the subject of immortality, in which he was a firm believer. That which was earthly in him has now passed away; but he was and still is a 'strong son of God.'" E. C

THE INWARD LIFE.

From Dr. Martineau's "Hours of Thought on Sacred Things."

The glories of the past are not in huge trades, or fine properties, or even in laws and rites and institutions which in their day kindled the passions of party strife: these, chafed into dust by the mouldering hand of time, successively fall away with the earthly conditions from which they come; while the mere impulses of expression, through which affection and admiration pour themselves forth and heart appeals to heart, mould themselves into imperishable Arts, though asking only for the most perishable of materials—forms and tones, colour and language; and precisely the most ethereal and interior of thoughts, which visit us only in evanescent gleams—of something terrible in sin, of something infinite in duty, of a possible union with God through love and a mastery of life through entire surrender—prove the most permanent realities in history; constructing themselves into faiths which have been the cradle of nations and the divine nurse of the most vivifying individual minds. The ink of Virgil on its thin leaf outlasts the Roman walls and aqueducts; nay, the unwritten words of Homer survive the cities where they were sung, and are our only guide to the rivers and plains which he has made immortal, but which nature and history could not keep. Of nothing does the aspect change more with time than of that wealth and station for which such sacrifices are made. Who now cares for all that Kallias had, in comparison with the least part of what Socrates was? or would save the banking credit of all the Fuggers at the cost of a table-talk of Luther's? Who would envy the pontificate of Leo, if he could have the pencil of Raffaelle? And in spiritual things, when they steal from their true retreats and dare to speak, it is the simplest truth and love that are surest to endure; and ages that can no longer yield the heart to the ceremonial of St. Peter's or Notre Dame or Westminster, will still surrender to the persuasive piety of a St. Francis, a Fénélon, a Leighton. Next to the judgments of God himself are the estimates of the human mind exposed to the long tests of history. And the pure insight of religion, if not intuitively present, may be reached perhaps by a silent circuit through the élite of generations gone.

Shall it then make no difference to us—except to our accumulated capital—that we live in an old human world, rich in the memory of ancient dynasties of thought? We are "the children of the prophets"; and are fond of owning it by rebuilding their tombs or raising memorials of a century's gratitude and honour. Shall the record of their genius and graces be fixed on the marble or the bronze, and tell no story except when there is sunshine to show it and an eye to read it? Shall it have no transcript on "the living tables of the heart," to be ever with us and gleam by night as well as day? We forfeit the chief source of dignity and sweetness in life, next to the direct communion with God, if we do not seek converse with the greater minds that have left their vestiges on the world. Rather let us keep a constant eye upon the light of their spirits, and never quit our hold of the shadowy hands, of which the nearest is almost at our door and the furthest feels the touch of Christ and disappears in the effulgence of God. If it is not given us, with the inspired apostle, to reach "the third heaven" in the twinkling of an eye, or, with the rapt mystic, to spring aloft on the wing of prayer and float straight into the arms of the Infinite Love, they will draw our feebler spirits upward by insensible attraction, and bring us to the same end at last. This blessed dependence, this holding on of link to link, of soul to soul, of age to age, is the true "communion of saints," which bridges the waters of death, and embraces its opposite banks in one City of God.

To-morrow, Sunday, is the anniversary of the birth of James Martineau, April 21, 1805.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

Habit.—II.

It is very hard at the beginning, this forming of a good habit. A first lie is easier than a brave truth-telling, but a first brave truth-telling makes the first lie and all other lies more difficult. For the ease which comes of doing over and over again is a blessing when we are masters of ourselves, and keep the Will to do or not to do, and the Conscience to prefer the right habit to the wrong. It is a curse when we let the habit master us, when we do because we cannot help, and whether it is a good habit or a bad. Believe me, children, if you do not keep making efforts of Will for the right and obeying the clear call of Conscience, the older you grow the fewer temptations to wrong you will resist, the weaker will be your Will-power to be good, and the more faltering your obedience to the voice of God. Bad habits will overcome you and crowd the good habits out of your life, and in God's sight you will be a failure.

This is what Tennyson means by that picture in one of his poems of Gareth, a brave young knight, riding out at the call of good King Arthur to grapple with "an old hard knight," who was a danger to the welfare of Arthur's kingdom. The knight appeared before Gareth "in hardened skins that fit him like his own," that is, in a number of bad habits that had almost become part of himself. Then this ugly enemy blew a hard and deadly note upon a horn, and out from an ancient storm-beaten pavilion came a grizzled hag, who armed him with old arms and a half-tarnished shield. A fierce struggle began. As often as Gareth brought the old knight grovelling on his knees, so often he vaulted up again, till Gareth seemed as one,

> That all in later, sadder age begins
> To war against ill uses of a life.
> But these from all his life arise, and cry
> "Thou has made us lords, and canst not put us down!"

Then the bold young knight tried harder. He hewed great pieces of the armour off, but lashed in vain against the hardened skins. At last the old warrior's sword broke, and then coward as he was, he tried to save himself in most unknightly fashion by writhing his arms round his enemy. Gareth, however, struggled to the uttermost, and hurled him headlong into a river. Gareth won, you see, because he was properly armed, had no unknightly habits, was master of himself, with temper and will well under control. Above all he was strong with the strength of a good conscience, knowing that he was fighting for the Right in the service of "the blameless king." But while you are glad he won, are not you very, very sorry for the hardened old sinner whose wasted life ebbed away in the river, his body dragged down by rusty armour, and all those hindering bad habits, and with no comfort in his heart, that he had ever fought unselfishly for a good cause?

One word more. The habit of Prayer keeps all the other good habits going, and helps you to start new good ones. The custom of saying prayerfully night and morning the prayer your parents have taught you, and the habit which children, as well as grown-up people can have, of feeling at any time, and anywhere, that God is always near us, caring very much about us, guiding us, and encouraging us in all good ways, will fill your lives with those habits which are blessings to yourselves and all around you, because they are what God needs in everyone of us, that we may help just a little to move His world upward and onward.

Emily H. Smith.

THE COMING OF SPRING.

Kissed by that Fairy Prince the Sun, young Spring,
The Sleeping Beauty watched for, prayed for long,
Arises, and a burst of glorious song
Heralds her coming with wild uttering.

Lo! through the world she goes, and at her breath
The branches blossom green, the flowers awake,
Loud winds are lulled to rest, and for her sake
The withered leaves no longer whisper "Death!"

And in the garden of each wintry breast
Spring sheds her largess as upon the earth,
And we, uprising, see within her birth
Great purposes of love made manifest.

Edward Teschemacher.

The duty of parents is to sustain a child's inner life with ideas as they sustain his body with food. The child has affinities with evil as well as with good; therefore hedge him about from any chance lodgment of evil suggestion. The initial idea begets subsequent ideas; therefore take care that children get right primary ideas on the great relations and duties of life. Thus we see how the destiny of a life is shaped in the nursery, by the reverent naming of the Divine name, by the light scoff at holy things, by the thought of duty the little child gets who is made consciously to finish his little task, by the hardness of heart that comes to the child who hears the faults and sorrows of others spoken of lightly.—The Unconscious Mind.

LONDON, APRIL 20, 1901.

THE INTERNATIONAL COUNCIL.

THE announcements which we made last week, and the fuller programme which is now being widely distributed, as to the New Century meetings which are to be held in London during Whit-week, offer a prospect of crowded interests and full enjoyment of social and religious fellowship, unparalleled, we should say, in the history of our churches in this country.

The British and Foreign Unitarian Association and the Sunday-school Association are to hold high festival, as is most fitting at the opening of a new century, and the proceedings of the week are to be crowned by meetings of even more exceptional interest, in which our own Association will be privileged to act as host in welcoming visitors from all parts of the world to the first general conference of the "International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers."

This Council, as our readers are aware, was inaugurated last year in America, on the occasion of the great meetings held in Boston to celebrate the seventy-fifth anniversary of the founding of the American Unitarian Association. The object of the Council is stated in the following terms :—

To open communication with those in all lands who are striving to unite pure religion and perfect liberty, and to increase fellowship and co-operation among them.

The first President of the Council is the Rev. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, M.A., of Oxford, and the secretary, the Rev. CHARLES W. WENDTÉ, of Newton Centre, Mass., who some little time ago issued a circular, announcing the Conference to be held in London in Whit-week, and giving the result of an extensive preliminary correspondence with Liberal religious workers in many lands. The response has been most cordial and gratifying, as the passages from letters, which we propose to quote immediately, will show. The circular also gave the following further explanation of the aim of the Council :—

It is designed to bring into closer union, for exchange of ideas, mutual service, and the promotion of their common aims, the scattered liberal congregations and isolated thinkers and workers for religious freedom in many lands.

The prominence given to the name Unitarian in the title is intended to mark the origin of the movement and the quarter from which in the first instance, at any rate, it has received its chief support; and the circular adds :—

It is hoped that it may also give to the liberal public the assurance of a rational, persistent, and catholic purpose. In any case, this term "Unitarian" is not to be here understood in any limited theological sense, but only as an endeavour to "unite," for common and unselfish endeavours, all believers in "pure religion and perfect liberty." The members of the Council, of whatever name or fellowship, desire to work together in the spirit of freedom and the love of truth for the religious enlightenment and uplifting of the world.

The response has come cordially from, we believe, every Protestant country in Europe, and from France and Italy, from the United States and Canada, from India and Japan, from South Africa and Australia, while exiled Russians long to help their country to share in its liberating influence, so that the officers of the Council are fully justified in their assertion of the need and opportunity for such an international movement, and the large usefulness that awaits it.

This will be more clearly seen if we now quote some passages from the large number of letters received by the secretary, and already published in the Christian Register of Boston. In each of the following cases the writer readily agrees to the request that his name may be added to the list of members of the International Council.

Mr. A. M. Bose, M.A., President of the Sadaran Brahmo Somaj, of Calcutta.

I can only from this distance be in heart with you, and join you in the hope and the prayer that, though there is much that is dark and evil, much that is born of narrowness and sectarianism, over the horizon as the century closes, yet the new century will see the kingdom of our heavenly Father established in all its breadth and freedom and catholicity, in its glorious Love and Brotherliness, which embraces all humanity, and so transcends all creed-made barriers.

Mr. Jitsumen Saji, Superintendent of the Japanese Unitarian Association, and Professor Kishimoto, of the Imperial Normal School, Tokio, Japan.

The aim of the Council is in perfect accordance with what we Japanese liberal thinkers have been meditating. The common fault with liberal thinkers is that they are detached and isolated. Nothing can be more desirable than to bring them together in fraternal relations and uniting their efforts for the promulgation of sound and enlightened principles of religion.

M. Ernest Fontanés, of Paris, hon. president of the Protestant Consistory of Havre.

I nourish my soul on the writings of Channing and Parker and Martineau, and of my beloved friend, Dean Stanley. It seems to me that the banner which should be displayed and saluted with enthusiasm by men of all races and all confessions is that which is inscribed with the legend, "The Gospel and Liberty," and that the true and universal church is that which Lincoln desired, which bears upon its portal only the two eternal commandments—the love of God and the love of man. In full sympathy with your work and your ideal, I beg you to accept my very modest co-operation and the assurance of my devoted and fraternal sentiments.

The Rev. P. N. Hugenholtz, junr., of Amsterdam.

I sympathise entirely with the principles and aims of the International Council, and I certainly hope to be present and participate in its proceedings next May. With great pleasure I will give you information concerning the advance of free religious thought in Holland, and more especially of the endeavours of my own free congregation, De Vrye Gemeende, and of the Protestanten Bond (the liberal Protestant Association).

The Rev. Dr. Chavannes, pastor of the French Walloon Church in Leiden.

Pure religion is impossible without perfect liberty. The propagation of the one, aided by the other, has been the life-task of many in many countries; but the time has now come to make this great work conspicuously international. I may not be able to do much toward this proposed international brotherhood of free Christians; but I greet with joy the initiative now taken, and consider it full of promise for the future.

In a similar strain Professor BOROS writes from Hungary, Signor BRACCIFORTI from Italy, Mr. THEO BERG from Copenhagen, and other distinguished correspondents from Germany, Switzerland, Sweden, Belgium, &c.; and the published programme shows how many and how eminent are the visitors whom we may hope to welcome to London in Whit-week.

Thus while our own societies hold their festival at the opening of the new century, and seek for their members a new spirit of consecration and strength for the service to which they are called, it is matter for sincerest congratulation that we are at the same time invited to take a wider outlook, and that the Unitarians of this country, through the International Council, will have the opportunity, in the most delightful manner, of realising that their place is in no narrow sectarian movement, but in a world-wide endeavour and aspiration, stirring the hearts of earnest men and women in every quarter of the globe.

Other Liberal Religious Thinkers and

Workers in this country, who are not afraid to have fellowship with Unitarians, are to take part in the proceedings, and it must be clearly understood that all such will be cordially welcomed to the meetings. In no other spirit could we prepare duly to honour the guests and members of the International Council, who have so warmly expressed their sympathy with its aims. And to our own people we would once more very earnestly insist on the greatness of the opportunity offered to them in the forthcoming meetings.

THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

COUNCIL MEETING.

A meeting of the Council was held on Tuesday afternoon, April 16, at Essex Hall. In the absence of the President, Sir J. T. Brunner, Bart., M.P., who was abroad, the chair was taken by Mr. Edwin Clephan, J.P. There were also present Mrs. L. M. Aspland, Miss Burkitt, Mr. G. W. Chitty, the Rev. V. D. Davis, B.A., Miss Florence Hill, Mrs. Alfred Lawrence, Miss Lawrence, Mr. Bernard Lewis, Mr. I. S. Lister, Mrs. W. G. Mace, Miss M. Martineau, Mr. David Martineau, J.P., Mr. Frederick Nettlefold, Mr. Oswald Nettlefold, Mr. F. Pinnock, the Rev. W. Chynoweth Pope, Miss Preston, Miss Marian Pritchard, Mr. Ion Pritchard, Mrs. Henry Rutt, Miss E. Sharpe, the Rev. F. W. Stanley, Mr. Hugh Stannus, Mr. J. Sudbery, Miss Tagart, Miss Tayler, Mr. E. C. Thurgood, Mr. T. Pallister Young, LL.B., and the Secretary.

The minutes of the last meeting of the Council on Oct. 23, 1900, having been read and confirmed, the Chairman made reference to the death of Mrs. Brooke Herford, and it was agreed that a letter be sent to Dr. Herford, expressing the deep sympathy of the Council. The Secretary then read the report of the Executive Committee, as follows:—

REPORT.

In accordance with the resolution adopted at the last meeting of the Council, a letter has been addressed to the secretaries of the District Associations, calling their attention to the importance of obtaining and preserving records of the endowments connected with the chapels and schools in their respective districts. It was suggested that they should ascertain whether any such records existed, and that they should ask each congregation to supply their Associations with a copy of the records if they did exist. The Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association also offered to preserve copies in safe custody in their strong-room, where the documents would be treated as strictly private, and would not be shown to any persons except those authorised by the trustees or congregation to inspect them. In making the suggestion the Association had no intention or desire to investigate matters which should properly be treated as the private business of each individual congregation. Knowing as they do from long experience that documents are frequently lost, they were only anxious to insure the preservation in safe custody of a duplicate record which at some future time might prove of great importance and value to the congregation itself. The Committee are glad to report that several of the secretaries of District Associations have recognised that the matter is one deserving careful attention, and they have promised that it will be brought before the notice of the congregations.

Finance.—The income from subscriptions and donations from Jan. 1 to March 31, 1901, amounted to £886, a slight falling-off from the previous year, dividends and interest £279, book department £438, which, with a balance of £40, brought from 1900, makes the total receipts £1,643. More than half of the subscriptions are received during the first quarter of the year, while the expenditure is spread nearly equally over the four quarters, consequently if there were not a considerable balance in hand at the present time, it would become impossible for the treasurer to meet the liabilities of the Association later in the year. Not only will the balance of £768 be required, in addition to the income still to come in, but unless new or increased subscriptions are obtained, the grants already voted for the current year will absorb £200 or £300 beyond the estimated income. The Committee are confident that if Unitarians up and down the country were to take the trouble to inquire into the variety and the extent of the good work done by the Association on behalf of religion, ample resources would soon be placed at the disposal of the treasurer. The Committee have great satisfaction in reporting that 192 congregations made collections on behalf of the Association, with the result that the sum of £572 18s. 7d. was received, being the largest number of congregations and the largest sum received since the establishment of "Association Sunday" in 1883.

Grants to Churches.—The grants voted for the current year towards supplementing the salaries of ministers were as follows:—Ashton, £100; Ballymena, £10; Bedfield, £30; Boston, £20; Bournemouth, £25; Bradford (Manchester), £40; Bridgwater, £62 (including special district missionary work by Mr. Broadrick); Cardiff, £20; Carlisle, £45; Chelmsford, £5; Chorlton-cum-Hardy, £40; Clydach Vale, £12 10s.; Congleton, £20; Crewkerne, £25; Darlington, £50 (conditional); Deal, £5; Denton, £50; Devonport, £20; Elland, £20; Forest Gate, £52; Framlingham, £20; Gateshead, £90; Hastings, £35; Heaton Moor and Urmston, £45; Huddersfield, £40; Kentish Town, £10 (six months); Kilburn, £15; Leicester (Narborough-road), £20; Lewisham, £35 (six months); Lydgate, £10; Mansford-street, £15; Middlesbrough, £30; Newark, £18; Newbury, £20; Nottage, £10; Nottingham (Christ Church), £30; Pentre, £12 10s.; Plumstead, £65; Pontypridd, £40 (conditional); Poole, £35; Small Heath, £50 (from appointment of minister); Southampton, £75; South Shields, £10; Stratford-on-Avon, £50; Torquay, £25; Warwick, £10; Whitchurch, £10; Wick, £10 (conditional); Wolverhampton, £80; Yeovil, £15. In addition to the foregoing list there are several other congregations whose applications are still under consideration. The Committee have voted £100 towards the salary of the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, the District Missionary of the London and South-Eastern Counties Provincial Assembly, and they have promised a similar amount towards the salary of the District Missionary about to be appointed by the North Midland Association. Grants have also been voted to Auckland, £75; Brussels, £10; Budapest, £50; Melbourne, £25; Sydney, £25. Special grants towards the expenses of church and school buildings have been made to Blackley, £50; Merthyr Tydfil, £100; Oldham-road (Manchester), £25. The committee were glad to render assistance to the East Cheshire Union, and the Manchester District Association in their "Forward Movement" work by providing a liberal supply of leaflets and pamphlets for distribution, and by allowing the secretary to lecture and preach.

Publications.—Through the generosity of Mr. William Rathbone, there is now in the press a new and cheap edition of the two volumes of sermons "Laws of Life after the Mind of Christ," by the late Rev. J. Hamilton Thom. These discourses by Mr. Thom are a most valuable contribution to sermon literature at the close of the nineteenth century. They are an evidence, if any were needed, that a Unitarian preacher may combine truth and love, and speak with power to mind and heart alike. A "Book of Seven Services for Public Worship," compiled by the Secretary from various sources, has been issued in response to often-repeated requests for a book which might prove helpful to some congregations and ministers who desire to use a liturgy at one or both of the Sunday services. The "Essex Hall Year Book" and the "Pocket Almanack" have again been issued by the Association. The publication of these books entails a considerable expenditure which the amount realised for copies sold does not nearly cover, but the usefulness of these publications renders the expenditure, in the opinion of the Committee, justifiable. A booklet, by Mrs. A. C. Osler, "Life's Upper School," dealing with the discipline of sorrow and suffering, has recently been published. On the suggestion of Dr. Courtney Kenny, "The Theist's Prayer Book," by Keshub Chunder Sen, has been reprinted for circulation in England and in India. Several Unitarian leaflets, pamphlets, and sermons have been issued since the last meeting of the Council, including "What do Unitarians believe?" by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, M.A.; "The Place of Yesterday, To-day, and To-morrow in Religion," by the Rev. W. Tudor Jones; "The Flowers of the Field," by the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke, M.A. The fourteen tracts by the late Rev. John Wright, B.A., on "The Denials and Beliefs of Unitarians" have been reprinted at the urgent request of Postal Mission secretaries and others who still find them most interesting and helpful to many inquirers. From Oct. 1, 1900, to March 31, 1901, grants of books and pamphlets have been made to congregations, Postal Missions and correspondents as follows:—1,176 books, 110,159 pamphlets, valued at £279 8s. 2d. The Rev. Stopford A. Brooke's "Religion in Literature and in Life" has been reprinted in a series of "What is worth While" booklets in America; a lady has also prepared an edition in Braille type for the use of the blind. Within the last few weeks the Committee have accepted a generous offer made by Mr. V. Tchertkoff, a personal friend of Count Tolstoy, to translate into the Russian language Dr. Herford's "Brief History of Unitarianism," Mr. Armstrong's "Unitarian Christianity Explained," Dr. Channing's discourse on "Unitarian Christianity," and Theodore Parker on "The Transient and Permanent in Christianity." A contribution towards the cost of printing has been promised by the Committee. Mr. Tchertkoff will read a short paper, giving the experiences and thoughts of a liberal religious thinker and worker in Russia, at the Whit-week meetings. For many months the preparation of a new edition of the "Essex Hall Hymnal" has been under consideration. The plates of the present edition are very much worn, and a Sub-Committee has been appointed to prepare a hymnal which it is hoped will prove even more helpful than the popular and widely-used book now in circulation. The Sub-Committee are taking steps to obtain the best available advice and suggestions in the preparation of the new book.

McQuaker Trust.—The following grants have been made towards supplementing the salaries of the ministers of non-self-supporting congregations for the current year:—Aberdeen, £90; Dundee, £85; Glasgow (South St. Mungo-street), £90; Kilmarnock, £100 (conditional); Kirkcaldy, £100. Grants of £12, for a series of special services in a public hall at Aberdeen, and £10, towards clearing off a debt of £30 at Kilmarnock, have also been made. The site for a new church building at Aberdeen has been secured, and the congregation and minister are now at work devising ways and means of erecting the church. The McQuaker Trustees have promised a contribution of £750. The Committee sympathise with the congregation at Kirkcaldy in the loss they have sustained by the removal of the Rev. A. E. Parry to Liscard. Mr. Parry, in addition to his church work, carried on a Postal Mission in Scotland. Quite recently the Trustees circulated among the ministers of the Established and the United Free Churches 1,000 copies of the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke's "Religion in Literature and in Life," and many letters of appreciation have been received in acknowledging the gift. The Secretary attended the annual meeting of the Scottish Unitarian Association in December, 1900. There is a promise of more active and earnest work on the part of the Association during the present year than it has recently displayed. The Secretary visited Aberdeen and Dundee, as well as Glasgow, preaching and addressing meetings at all three places.

Work in India.—The Committee cannot speak too highly of the activity and earnestness shown by the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams in India. He has been constantly at work, preaching, lecturing, writing to the newspapers and magazines, and holding conferences with religious inquirers. Unfortunately, the climate and the strain of work have told on his health, and he feels compelled to return home. He will sail from Calcutta by the P. and O. s.s. Sicilia, on April 30. He hopes that the sea voyage may restore him to health and strength before his arrival in England at the end of May. He writes, under date of March 25: "I cannot tell you how sorry I am to break off, but I find it impossible to go on any longer. I came up to Darjeeling a fortnight ago in the hope and belief that I should pull myself together again; but I am not only no stronger but much weaker, and it would be both improper and useless for me to remain in a state of inability to do any public work." The Indian newspapers speak in the highest terms of the work which Mr. Williams has accomplished in India. The executive committee of the Sadharan Brahmo Somaj, in their report, record their sincere thanks to the B. and F.U.A. for appointing Mr. Williams as the representative of the Association. "He has worked here as one of us, contributing to the papers of the Somaj, conducting divine services in the metropolis, which have become a great source of attraction to the Brahmo public of all sections, as well as to the outside public; and it is hoped that if these services are continued for a length of time they will be the means of attracting within the pale of the Somaj a very large number of men who could hardly have been reached by us. His preaching tour in the North-western Provinces and in Behar, during the last autumn, attracted considerable attention on the part of the educated public of those provinces to the Brahmo Somaj. To Mr. Fletcher Williams personally, the Committee convey their best thanks for inviting the members of three sections of the Brahmo Somaj in Calcutta to co-operate in all matters where no doctrinal differences are involved; and, at the same time, they record their cordial appreciation of the work done by him for the furtherance of the cause of the Somaj. But the Committee would fail in their duty if they did not at the same time record the gratitude of the Brahmo public, as well as that of the dying hundreds of Western India and Rajputana, to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, who spontaneously, and guided by humanitarian feelings, collected so large a sum for their relief."

The Council have already learned through the columns of The Inquirer and Christian Life of the death of Mr. Moti Bulasa, M.A., who died at Port Said on his way to England last October. There was every promise that he would have proved an excellent student at Manchester College, Oxford. The Committee forwarded a letter expressing their deep sympathy with his relatives in their sad and unexpected loss. The Committee representative of the various Somajes at Calcutta received seven applications for the Indian Scholarship at Oxford this year, and they have recommended that Mr. Vithal Ranji Shinde, B.A., of Bombay and Poona, should be appointed.

Japanese Student.—In the early days of the Unitarian Mission at Tokio, the B. and F.U.A. made a yearly grant in aid of the work which the American Unitarian Association had undertaken in Japan. The Unitarian movement is now under the direct control and management of the Japanese themselves. Two services are held every Sunday, and the hall is crowded by a reverent and interested congregation. There are seven Japanese Unitarian preachers, several of whom are also college professors or teachers. One of these preachers, Mr. Zennosuke Toyosaki, a University graduate, with the assistance of a liberal grant of £75 from the B. and F.U.A., is coming over to England to study at Manchester College, Oxford. Mr. Toyosaki comes with very high recommendations, and he hopes to be in London in time for the Anniversary Meetings in Whit-week. The Committee now support a McQuaker, an Hungarian, an Indian, and a Japanese student at Oxford. They may therefore claim that they are doing good work on behalf of an educated ministry.

Special Services and Lectures.—The Rev. Stopford A. Brooke, M.A., preached at Rochdale, Oldham, Southampton, and Oxford. His health then gave way, and he was unable to preach for several weeks. On his recovery he preached at Hampstead, and then for six successive Sundays he occupied the pulpit at Little Portland-street. Crowded congregations were present on each occasion. Mr. Stopford Brooke will preach at St. James's Hall in anniversary week, and arrangements are in progress for services in the autumn. The Committee for the first time tried the experiment of arranging for a series of six lectures on "The Bible in the Nineteenth Century," by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A., of Oxford. The lectures were delivered in London, Bolton, Leeds, and Liverpool. Local Committees provided a public hall, and attended to the advertising; those who made the arrangements are to be congratulated on the success which followed their efforts. Mr. Carpenter's lectures attracted and held large audiences week after week, and the Committee of the B. and F.U.A. are greatly indebted to him for the splendid service he rendered to the cause of an enlightened knowledge of the history and interpretation of Biblical criticism. It is hoped that he will be able to resume his lecturing work in the autumn. There is evidently a distinct place for work of this special type, when such an able and interesting lecturer is available.

Deceased Members.—The Committee regret to report that two members of the Council have died recently. Mr. William Blake, of Bridge, South Petherton, came of good Unitarian stock, and he was ever a loyal and sturdy friend of liberal thought and work in the district in which he lived. The Rev. William Binns preached the annual sermon in 1878, and contributed the lecture on "The Supreme Moral Law" in "Positive Aspects of Unitarian Christianity." Rugged in manner and unconventional in speech, he was one of the brightest minds and the kindliest hearts in the ranks of the Unitarian ministry. To-day the news comes of the death of Mrs. Thomas Chatfeild Clarke, widow of a former president, and sister to Mr. Frederick Nettlefold. She did not take any active part in public work, but in the quiet of her home she inspired members of her family with a love of public service, and was the support of her late husband in his many duties; and she was always ready with her sympathy and help in the benevolent work of our Domestic Missions. The members of the Council will desire to convey to the relatives and friends of the departed their tender sympathy in the time of sorrow.

The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the report, recalled the first meeting of the Association which he had attended in the year 1838, and said how much he was struck by the growth of the work. He had only a vague remembrance of what took place at that early meeting, but it was occupied chiefly with the discussion of differences of opinion, which were very acute. It was the time when the Rev. John James Tayler was bringing the influence of German theology to bear upon the thought of their people, and the Rev. James Martineau was looked upon as a dangerous heretic, and the progressive movement was strongly opposed by the older members of the body. The question of belief in miracles was then discussed as vital; but since then their thought had widened, and they had liberty to follow their conviction on that and other questions. They were noble and fine men, the Asplands and Madges of that day, who had been pioneers of their movement, but great progress had been made since then. He had asked the Secretary to furnish him with some figures, which showed this. In 1838 the Association raised £871 and spent £623, which showed that either they had not the opportunity or did not care then to use up their resources in making grants to churches; but in 1890 their income had been £5,090, and their expenditure £5,060, so that they had spent the whole of what they received in active work, and, as they had heard, would have to spend more in the present year than their income unless it was largely increased. They had also an income of £900 from the McQuaker Fund, £450 for the Special Indian Fund, and another £450 for the Special Services Fund, altogether £1,800, in addition to the ordinary income of the Association. When they remembered also the resources of the large Sustentation Funds and the movement for providing an Annuity Fund, which they were very anxious to carry to a successful issue, they would see how great was the amount of work being done by the Unitarian body. The work of the Association was very widely extended, and, looking to the future, they might be satisfied with their position. He had sometimes been dejected going into some of their old chapels, where formerly there were large congregations, but then he remembered that formerly those chapels enclosed Unitarianism within themselves, but now the theology and the spirit of Unitarianism were everywhere. From Russia, from Hungary, and other distant countries they received appeals for help, and they might be satisfied that, while the sect was still small, it did a vast amount of good, which would lead to much more. He remembered when Joseph Barker left the Methodists and came among Unitarians he had attended a reception at Leicester, and Barker had said to them that until they went out into the market-place and the streets, as the Methodists had done, Unitarians would not make much headway with the people. That advice, he thought, pointed in the right direction, and there was much that intelligent and educated laymen might do in that way.

Mr. ION PRITCHARD seconded the adoption of the report.

Miss SHARPE asked whether anything was done or could be done for the display of Unitarian literature in shop windows in the West and South of London, as was done with such advantage in the North.

Miss TAGART said she was glad steps were being taken in accordance with her motion in the matter of securing a record as to endowments, but expressed regret that the reference as to trustees had not been taken up.

Mr. T. P. YOUNG spoke with gratification of the large amount of work done, as shown in the report, and was sure that the facts only needed to be widely known to secure a large addition to their income.

Miss FLORENCE HILL spoke with warm approval of the recently published "Seven Services," and wished to thank Mr. Bowie personally, and the Association for bringing out the book.

The report having been adopted, the SECRETARY made a statement as to the forthcoming Whitsuntide meetings, which promised to be very largely attended from all parts of the country.

Mr. PRITCHARD said that as to hospitality, they should entertain the Foreign delegates at a central hotel in Westminster, and that for the representatives of churches and schools they were arranging for lodgings chiefly about the Russell-square district. The cost, not including dinner, would be, roughly speaking, 25s. for the week.

It was reported that the following names of deceased members had been removed from the list of the Council:—The Rev. William Binns, Messrs. W. Blake, J. T. Ellerbeck, R. Eve, and C. E. Pinnock. It was agreed that the following should be nominated members of the Council:—Messrs. W. B. Bowring, C. Eckersley, J. G. Pinnock, R. Robinson, J. Sudbery, and the Revs. J. C. Odgers, and Lawrence Scott.

A vote of thanks to the Chairman, proposed by Mr. David Martineau, brought the meeting to a close.

LIFE'S UPPER SCHOOL.*

THIS booklet, by Mrs. Alfred Osler, of Birmingham, consists of three brief chapters—"Learning," "Loyalty," and "Cui Bono?" Its origin, we should suspect from internal evidence, was in some incident of private grief, and the writer, having learnt the divine lesson of suffering and sorrow, speaks out of her own experience for the help of others in a like case. Other teachers have spoken to her—Mrs. Browning, Mrs. King in "The Disciples," Ruskin, Tennyson, and Watts in his great picture, "Love and Death"—and they are quoted to enforce the writer's own words.

What is it we learn as we sit in the darkness, with the soul's hearing astrain for a whisper from beyond the gates? Something of the true relative worth of things—the real and the factitious treasures of life—the wisdom which is above rubies—the foolishness of much which had seemed important. Go into a stricken home-circle, and mark the divine touch of sympathy, the self-forgetfulness, the devotion, which has suddenly sprung to life in even the least gracious natures. How near and real at such times become the eternal verities, too often swept into the backwaters of our consciousness by the swirling tide of trivialities which we call practical life! In the solemn leisure which a great affliction brings, we live (if only temporarily) on a higher mental level than usual—may even rise to fellowship with a higher order of minds than that with which we usually associate. The thoughts of poets and prophets, hitherto perhaps little understood or cared for, glow with new meaning for us, and awaken a thrill of response. Who has ever appreciated the spiritual riches of Tennyson's "In Memoriam," until quickened by a sorrow kindred to his?

From the lessons of suffering we are led to loyalty to the Highest, and the answer to the question "Cui Bono?" is not doubtful. All the strange vicissitudes of life are compassed about by the Eternal Goodness, and we learn what this means as we give ourselves up to the leadings of unselfish love.

It is to achieve this power of helpfulness that life's upper school should fit us; to be able to carry not only our own burdens, but the loads—great and small—of our fellow-wayfarers; and to carry them faithfully, reverently, silently. For sore hearts will not cast their care under the open notice, "Ashes may be laid here": they need a closed and sacred urn to trust to.

And while they trust us, they also teach us. There is nothing which gives such an insight into our own stupendous ignorance and the divine over-ruling wisdom, as to be admitted into the secrets of many lives; to watch the marvellous evolution of ultimate good from apparent evil, of order from apparent chaos.

And the conclusion is that so long as Love and Service are possible we have light enough upon our way—

Enough to give us trust that having got by heart all the lessons of our school on earth, we may reach forward in hope to the higher standpoint which Tennyson pictures for those who have gone before us.

"Ye watch, like God, the rolling hours
With larger other eyes than ours,
To make allowance for us all."

Unwilling readers may grumble to have had to pay a shilling (or 9d.) for so slight a booklet, notwithstanding its tasteful binding; but others will better understand its worth, hearing the tones of sincerity, and welcoming every such genuine utterance which leads upwards, out of the shadows into clearer light.

* "Life's Upper School." By Mrs. A. C. Osler. (London: Philip Green, 5, Essex-street, Strand. Price 1s.)

THERE is but one source of power in the universe. Whatever then you are, painter, actor, musician, writer, religious teacher, or whatever it may be, know that to catch and take captive the secret of power is to work in conjunction with the Infinite Power in order that it may continually work and manifest through you. If you fail in doing this, you fail in everything. When you come into the realisation of your oneness with the Infinite Life and Power, and open yourself that it may work through you, you will find that you have entered upon an entirely new phase of life and that an ever-increasing power will be yours. Then it will be true that your strength will be as the strength of ten because your heart is pure.—R. W. Trine.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

THE NORTHERN EVANGEL.

IF the story of Unitarian propaganda in Scotland were written, it might seem like an endeavour to get figs from thistles and bread from granite. But it is evident to the student of the ecclesiastical thistle that it is not what it was when Richard Wright saw it, and touched it in 1809, in his zeal for Unitarian doctrine.

Its thorn is softer, its prick less pungent, and it is not so fain to shed sectarian seeds. Indeed, the liberal Scottish divine, even with the symbol of his country on his note-paper, is inclined to say "figs." And the granite is no less changed. It has felt the inward fire of a new creation, and its stony heart has yielded to the melting forces. It is now as wax in the hands of the evolutional powers.

The softening of the spikes of the sacerdotal thistle is curiously illustrated in the reviews of theological books which appear in Scottish newspapers. The chief papers in Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Aberdeen are Conservative in politics, but their reviews of theological writings are invariably of a Liberal kind. In the leading paper here, sympathy is usually and frankly expressed with advanced theology, and the rational spirit is encouraged. And in the critical essays of the younger divines, we are made witnesses of the "stubborn thistle bursting into glossy purples" of evolutionary expression.

How much of the change is due to the persistent activity of the Unitarian apostles during the century, it is for the judicial historian to say. I think the phenomenon presented by the ecclesiastical student of Unitarianism in Scotland is one well worth his study. I do not at present attempt to sketch it, but, being engaged locally in a forward movement, I have taken the backward measure needful for the venture. It has deeply impressed me with the significance of the Unitarian movement in the thistly and granitic region. The movement was not a native determination, it was an incursion from the South. Although the Scottish soul takes to theology eagerly and holds to it dourly, Scotland did not originate a theological philosophy. The Calvinism which it adopted came to it from abroad. So did the Arminianism which checked and qualified the dominant creed. Likewise, the more liberal ideas in Unitarian form came hither with men of Southern stock. The one thing which opened Scotland to the Unitarian seedsman was the absence of theological tests in the Scottish Universities. The coming of men holding Unitarian views to study at our Colleges became occasions of heretical propaganda. That unique freedom gave Unitarianism its opportunity beyond the Tweed.

The carrying of the Unitarian heresy so far north as Aberdeen in the slow coaching days was due to Richard Wright. In 1809 he spent fifty-two days in Scotland as a Unitarian missionary. His preaching in Aberdeen infected a few earnest minds, who ever after looked southward for light and leading. In 1833 a zealous Scot, the Rev. Archibald Macdonald, sought to combine ministerial with filial duty, and while visiting his parents took occasion to propagate in the Granite City the faith to which he had become a convert. He preached for two Sundays to large crowds. After him came the giant seedsower, the Rev. George Harris. He also had the Galilean experience — "the common people heard him gladly." The audiences of these pioneers ranged from 800 to 4,000, and seem wonderful now, only it has to be remembered that the period was one of intense political excitement, and large outdoor meetings were common. And Mr. Harris was equally strong as a politician and a theologian.

In Aberdeen we seem to have completed one circle and now have to begin an outer one. I have had experiences similar to that of Mr. Harris. Special in-door meetings of a propagandist sort have brought out large audiences, and out-door addresses have attracted thousands. This experience is not merely northern. I had it at Glasgow and Kilmarnock. I have proved that a fearless and rational exposition of Unitarian views fetches and converts, and I believe there are great possibilities in reserve in this respect waiting on our further outgoing. We have the cycle now; what might not the cycling missionary do in a seven weeks' tour?

In the days of the first propagandists advocacy was more by the spoken than by the written word. The newspaper was taxed and the pamphlet was dear, and so the enlightening speaker was welcome. To-day we have many newspapers and plenty of free pamphlets, and people read more, but still the earnest speaker with advanced ideas will get a large audience if he goes forth to sow under the sky. However, here we are in Aberdeen, after twelve years of such speaking by myself, about to build a new church. Sixty years ago the present church was built after a period of vigorous propagation. The granite responded then, and it is responding again to the touch of faith. The first Unitarian congregation here was found on the hill by the sea-shore, and the new elements in the present one were found there also.

The church reared in 1840 has proved too straight for our work and our duty. We have not proper labouring room. We seek to give daily bread, not merely to provide Sunday aliment. We want to employ ourselves educationally, and make our church a centre of civic activity.

We have secured a central site, with a house on it, which we wish to have free as a manse. We will proceed to erect a church which some desire to call "The Martineau Memorial Church," in memory of the venerable man who preached here in 1859, on the occasion of the first visit of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, who loved our northern hills and left us an example of high thinking. With the new church and buildings connected with it we will be equipped, for the first time, for the work at hand. Our present church will be under the auctioneer's hammer ere this is in print, and we hope to get a good price for it. The prospect of new life has united us and evoked fresh fervour, and we will enter our second temple rejoicing.

I have given up my place on the School Board to devote myself to the work connected with our renewal and expansion. The McQuaker Trustees have encouraged our project, and granted £750 towards it.*

We are rallying our members for a worthy financial effort. We consider that the city owes us something and will make our appeal to it by and by. I have given many years to public service here in various ways, always at a sacrifice of time, and twice at a sore health cost. Perhaps our venture will realise a compensation. To the south we must again look for such generosity as it can extend to us.

It is noteworthy that the Unitarian movement in Scotland has generally been of the common people. Our representative men, native to the soil—Christopher Dunlop, George Hope, Ivie Mackie, and William McQuaker—were men who sprung from the labouring classes. If the riches of the Aberdeen Unitarians had been equal to their zeal, there would never have been a financial difficulty. Once one of their leaders was rich enough to leave a legacy of £50, and that seemed a fortune to the poverty-stricken body. It is pathetic to read the minutes (dating from 1833 till now), and trace the course of the struggle for existence. Never able to pay a decent salary, the flock could not retain a pastor long.

The first carried the crook for a year and then committed suicide. Since then seventeen preachers appear on the flickering list, their ministries varying from nine months to six years. My own two periods form the longest of all, being twelve years and a half. The northern air has a habit of nipping off the southern ardour. It needs a native to stand it, and even he needs all his grit. No sooner is he in a position of favour than a shower of stones reminds him that he is here on sufferance!

Our churches in Scotland are so far apart, and we have so few opportunities of intercourse, that it is not possible for any one to speak intimately of the condition of all. I can but indicate in a general way what is going on. At Dundee, Mr. Williamson continues a lengthy and arduous ministry in circumstances of much difficulty. He is surrounded by liberal preachers on whose congregations the stigma of heresy is not fastened, but he pursues his solitary way undaunted. He deserves everlasting credit for his faithful plodding.

The Kirkcaldy brethren are parting with their first settled pastor in a regretful spirit. Mr. Parry has acquitted himself very bravely in the "lang toon," and won high respect, It is to be hoped that the thriving linoleum centre will not be long without a preacher of the liberal faith.

The church in the capital keeps its lamps brightly trimmed amid the obscurantism of a diplomatic orthodoxy. All honour to it!

The St. Vincent-street congregation (Glasgow) has rallied loyally round its new minister. Mr. Forrest's ministerial training being Scotch, and having his foot on his native heath, he has every advantage in speaking to Scottish hearers. He will, no doubt, creditably sustain the reputation of eloquent speech belonging to the pulpit of his predecessors.

The South St. Mungo-street congregation (Glasgow) keeps on its way under its cheery pastor. It does not "wax fat," but it works and trusts that its labour is not in vain.

At Kilmarnock things are rather backward with the worshippers in the venerable building in Clark's-lane. They are without a pastor, and such have been their later experiences that they are doubtful of their course. It seems almost a catastrophe to have the historic kirk closed. But, if it comes to closing, the farewell may be said in the assurance that while "our little systems have their day and cease to be," the spirit of truth is more than they.

But the development of the thistle thorn into a figleaf does not let us off. We have to hold the field for an undogmatic theology and a spiritual religion. The reformation of the reformation in Scotland is taking place inwardly with marvellous rapidity. Calvinism has already put on much of the "new man." An organic change is taking place in its vital tissue, and the process will go on till the conversion is complete. The controversy of our fathers is closed. The attack of the veterans of the thirties in last century is not such as we have to make. Harnack has justified Harris, and gone beyond him. We can appeal now to the masters of the higher criticism to prove the propheticness and vitalness of the work of our pioneers. All along the line of controversy we have won. Surely we may now build without the sword. We have to be alive to the changed conditions of our work. We have still a place and a function. We have to make our ideas corporate. Their rationality is virtually proved; we have now to get them into fitting moral shape. We are out of the polemical era, and into the practical. For the new epoch we need new institutions and instrumentalities. This is how we feel here, and why we want a new Church.

Alex. Webster.

THE WHIT-WEEK MEETINGS IN LONDON.

WHO MAY ATTEND?

The Secretaries of several congregations have been inquiring whether the number of representatives from each place is limited to what may be called "official" delegates. We are requested by the Committee to say that a hearty welcome is extended to everyone who desires to attend. If twenty, fifty, or one hundred people wish to come to London for the meetings from one place all the better. The Committee who have the arrangements in hand will be delighted to see them. The meetings, services, and excursions are open to all alike, and places will be reserved for those who apply early. The special privileges accorded to the minister and to one delegate from the congregation and another from the Sunday-school are these:—A free ticket for the Sunday School Association breakfast and the British and Foreign Unitarian Association conversazione; the first chance of attending the reception at the Mansion House and at Carlton House-terrace, and some other social functions, and of reserved seat tickets for the service at St. James's Hall, and the public meeting at Westminster Town Hall. Otherwise, all will be treated alike. The ladies in charge of the tea-room at Essex Hall will welcome visitors from any congregation or school at afternoon tea daily throughout the week, and the stewards will render every assistance to make their stay in London profitable and enjoyable. Applications from those who wish to purchase breakfast and conversazione tickets should be sent in early to Mr. Philip Green or Mr. B. C. Hare, as the price will be largely increased some days beforehand.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Ashton-under-Lyne.—Through the generosity of one of our members, Mr. Samuel Taylor, all the old people of the town, of seventy years and over, had tea and entertainment provided for them in the school on Wednesday, April 10. More than 200 accepted the invitation.

Astley.—The annual school sermons were preached on Sunday by the Rev. R. C. Moore, of Horwich, who gave two very appropriate sermons. Special music was rendered, the choir being assisted by friends from Chowbent and Leigh. The singing was accompanied by a string band. The singing of the children in the hymns "O'er the wide and restless ocean" and "Have ye looked for my sheep in the desert" was much appreciated. Notwithstanding the unfavourable weather, the collections were over £21.

Atherton (Chowbent Chapel).—On Sunday last, upon his return from a holiday in the Pyrenees, the Rev. J. J. Wright preached in the morning on "The Pyrenees in Passion Week and Easter Time," and in the evening on "Lourdes: its Significance."

Ballymena.—The Rev. J. Pollard, by invitation of the minister, recently attended the annual mission at the Methodist Chapel, to meet a missionary from South Africa, and was asked to open the meeting with prayer, and to take part in it.

Bootle.—On the 15th inst., after a social reception by the Rev. J. Morley Mills and Mrs. Mills, the annual business meeting of the Free Church was held, the Rev. H. W. Hawkes in the chair. The Treasurer's and Committee's reports were highly satisfactory, showing a marked growth in finances and membership. In one way and another, including donations from Liverpool friends towards the extinction of a debt on caretaker's cottage, the church had raised £122 more than in any year of its history. The Sunday-school and all other church societies were flourishing. After election of officers, &c., for the coming year, the minister gave a hearty and inspiriting address, which ended the meeting.

Bournemouth.—A Sale of Work in aid of the funds of the Unitarian Church was held in the Lecture Hall on Wednesday, April 10, under the management of Mrs. C. C. Coe, president of the Ladies' Sewing Society, and was open from 3 to 6.30 P.M. There was a good attendance, and all the articles offered were quickly disposed of. The amount realised, including donations, was £27 10s.

Bristol: Lewin's Mead.—An encouraging season of work during the winter months has been closed amid pleasant evidences of the strengthening of the ties uniting the Sunday-schools with the congregation. A very interesting gathering took place in the Congregational Lecture Hall on the afternoon of Sunday, March 31. Forty of the elder scholars had expressed their desire to associate themselves with Lewin's Mead meeting. To that end they had been prepared by their teachers from a course of lessons indicated by the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, and the result was a simple but impressive service of recognition. The teachers and scholars were joined, not only by several friends from the congregation, but by the Congregational Committee as a body, a fact unique in the history of the schools, and full of interest for the future of the congregation itself. After a brief devotional service, conducted by Mr. W. Alfred T. Price, the superintendent of the Boys' Sunday-school, the assembled scholars were addressed most appropriately and earnestly on the responsibility they had assumed by their constant friend, Mr. J. Kenrick Champion, who not only formally welcomed them on behalf of the congregation, but spoke to them as having been connected with the Sunday-school from his youth. He was followed by the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, who bade the young people think of him not only as the minister, but as the friend of those who had thus thrown in their lot with the interests of their ancient and honoured religious home. The Elder Scholars' annual party was held, as usual, on the Wednesday in Easter week, the arrangements being undertaken by Miss Price and her staff of teachers in the Girls' School. More than seventy were present, a bright and successful evening being spent. The teachers and scholars were joined by the minister, and Mrs. and Miss Blatchford, and hearty greetings to the young people were expressed by the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, Mr. W. Alfred T. Price, Miss Newman (for long a faithful teacher at Lewin's Mead, but now actively associated with the work of the Hurst-street Domestic Mission, Birmingham), and by Miss Price, the Superintendent of the Lewin's Mead Girls' Sunday-school.

Halifax.—On Tuesday and Wednesday, April 9 and 10, a successful Sale of Work was held at the Northgate End Branch School in Queen's-road. The sale was opened by Mrs. H. R. Oddy on the first and by Mr. E. B. Stott on the second day. The total receipts were a little over £51, to be devoted to cleaning and decorating the premises.

Ipswich.—Last Sunday being the anniversary of Handel's death, a special musical service was held in the evening, when a congregation of over 240 attended to listen to a short sketch of the composer's life by the minister, the Rev. Lucking Tavener, illustrated by various anthems and solos taken from his greatest works. Mr. Tavener has just concluded a course of evening discourses on "Great Men of the Nineteenth Century and their Influence on the Thought and Work of the Time," including among others Martineau, Darwin, Huxley, Watts, Browning, and Tennyson. The services were well attended and the addresses much appreciated. New vigour is being manifested by the congregation under Mr. Tavener's leadership in the Sunday-school, Girls' Social Circle, and the Ladies' Guild. The latter has just finished a large parcel of clothes for the Boer women and children at the various "voluntary" camps in South Africa.

Kidderminster.—On Easter Sunday morning a Confirmation Service was held at the New Meeting, conducted by the minister, the Rev. E. D. Priestley Evans, when thirty-seven young men and women were welcomed into the fellowship of the church, At the close of his address, which was solely to the young people, Mr. Evans called upon each one by name, and, taking them by the right hand, said: "'A. B.,' I welcome you into the fellowship of this church, which is devoted to the worship of God and the service of man; and may the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God dwell in you richly, and bring forth the fruits of righteousness." At the close of the reception a dedication hymn, by Hornblower Gill, was sung, after which the young people joined in the Communion Service, together with a large number of the congregation, Mr. W. H. Talbot and Mr. A. G. Hopkins, acting as "deacons," distributing the elements among the congregation. During the ceremony of the reception the whole congregation remained standing, as a sign of welcome to the young people. Services were also held on Thursday, the eve of Good Friday, and on Good Friday. On Thursday evening the service was entirely a Communion Service, which was well attended. Mr. Hopkins, Mr. Alderman Hepworth, and Mr. Campbell acted as "deacons."

King's Lynn.—For more than a year past services at this church have been conducted by supply, during which time the congregation has held well together. For the last two Sundays the services have been kindly undertaken by Mr. J. T. Mackey, of London, who was at Lynn on a visit. His services were much appreciated.

Llandyssul: Capel y Graig.—At the evening service on Sunday last, the Rev. E. D. Priestley Evans preached to a large congregation. Collections were made for the funds of the South Wales Unitarian Association.

London: Peckham.—A vocal and orchestral concert, organised by Miss Kate E. Carter in aid of the church funds, was given on Tuesday last by the Avondale Literary Society, with most satisfactory results. By this entertainment, in conjunction with one already given by Mr. G. V. Carter, it is expected that the debt of £25 due to the church treasurer will be reduced by about one-third.

Selby.—A meeting was held on Tuesday, April 9, in connection with the Forward Movement of the Yorkshire Unitarian Union, and to welcome the Rev. J. Dale to the ministry of the Free Christian Church. After tea the chair was taken by Mr. Reuben Knott, who, with other members of the congregation, spoke of the value of the movement, and of the lectures which Mr. Dale had given. The Rev. C. H. Cook also spoke of the result of the movement in quickening the religious life of their own people, and affirmed his conviction of the need of the Unitarian message, and his confidence that in the future they would reap a larger harvest. The Rev. J. Dale spoke on the same subject, and laid stress on the positive side of their message. The chairman then moved a resolution of welcome to Mr. and Mrs. Dale, which was seconded by Mr. Blythe, supported by the Revs. C. Hargrove, H. Rawlings, and C. H. Cook, and cordially acknowledged.

South Shields.—On Tuesday, April 9, the twenty-eighth anniversary of the opening of Unity Church was celebrated, and at the same time a welcome was extended to Mr. Thomas Paxton as the newly-appointed minister. After tea the chair was taken by Ald. J. Baxter Ellis, J.P., President of the N. and D. Unitarian Association. The Rev. Frank Walters, on behalf of the ministers of the district, extended a cordial welcome to Mr. Paxton, in which the Revs. C. Travers and F. Wood, and Mr. J. Adams, representing the congregation, joined. Mr. Paxton responded, and a welcome to the visitors was acknowledged by Councillor R. Affleck, J.P., of Gateshead. Thanks to the chairman brought an enthusiastic meeting to a close.

Stannington.—On Sunday, April 7, the usual Easter services were held, the preachers being the Rev. J. Lee, Congregational minister of Loxley, and the Rev. Iden Payne. There was a good congregation at each service, and the collections were above the average. On the following Tuesday the children of the Sunday-school were given a free tea, after which about 100 teachers and friends partook of tea also. At seven o'clock a very enthusiastic public meeting was held in the chapel. On taking the chair the Rev. I. Payne spoke of the increasing liberality of the times, as instances of which he stated that a short time since, on the invitation of the vicar, he attended and took part at a meeting connected with the Established Church, and that early in March he received a very kind letter from the Rev. Arthur Rudman inviting him to take part in a week's "mission" promoted by the Wesleyans, which he accepted, and on two occasions took part in the services; he might also say that to their gratification their pulpit in the afternoon was occupied by a Congregational minister. As to their own condition, Mr. Payne spoke very hopefully of their prospects. Since the beginning of March they had had morning and evening services, and the congregations had been most gratifying, while nearly twenty subscribing members had been added to the roll. They had also largely increased their staff of teachers, and now the Sunday-school met in the afternoon as well as in the morning. The Rev. J. Lee also took part in the meeting, and was cordially thanked for his services.

Stockton-on-Tees.—The annual Sunday-school services were held on April 14, when the Rev. John Fox, of Leeds, preached to good congregations. On Monday the usual tea and entertainment followed, when the scholars gave two sketches, and Mr. Fox distributed the prizes for good conduct, &c.

Wolverhampton (Appointment).—With the liberal assistance of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and the Midland Christian Union, the congregation here have been fortunate in securing the services, as resident minister, of the Rev. J. Bellamy Higham, B.A. Mr. Higham, who is a native of Plymouth, was educated at Cambridge, and after graduating took orders in the Church, and held several curacies. Subsequently he was appointed by the Birmingham Corporation as minister to the workpeople employed at the Elan Valley Waterworks. This was an absolutely unsectarian appointment, and Mr. Higham discharged the duties for six years with great success. He has now sought admission to the ranks of the Unitarian ministry. A very successful social tea and annual business meeting of the congregation was held on Thursday week, and it is hoped that a formal welcome meeting to Mr. Higham and his family will take place in a few weeks' time.

LONDON DISTRICT UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

APRIL, 1901.

The President and Committee have learned with great regret that Mr. David Martineau has expressed his wish to be relieved of the duties of the Treasurership at the next Annual Meeting.

After Mr. Martineau's thirty years of untiring and devoted service, it is felt that the Committee have no claim to press him to continue in office. They are confident that all the members and friends of the Society would wish to mark their sense of his invaluable services in some signal manner; and they are assured that nothing would be more congenial to his own feelings than the raising of such a fund as would enable him to leave office without a deficiency on the Society's Balance Sheet.

The present debt of about £350 is the last accumulation of a series of heavy deficits which Mr. Martineau has cheerfully borne during his long period of office. In spite of the inadequacy of its resources, the Society has helped substantially in the establishment of no fewer than fifteen permanent congregations in that period; and the Treasurer's personal share in the work involved in this church-extension has been simply invaluable.

It should be explained that no grant has been available from the funds of the great Unitarian Bazaar, 1900 (the relief from that successful enterprise being strictly limited to paying off incumbrances on lands and buildings), but in future years some relief will indirectly be felt, owing to many congregations being relieved from burdens now weighing upon them.

The Committee feel, therefore, that an effort must now be made to raise the sum named, so that a fresh start may be made without incumbrance. Remittances may be made to Mr. H. EPPS, 95, Upper Tulse Hill, S.W.

Signed on behalf of the Committee,

JOHN T. BRUNNER, President.

NEW UNITARIAN CHURCH AT WOOD GREEN.

AFTER ten years which have elapsed since Unitarianism was first planted in Wood Green, it has been decided to erect a Church, on the land reserved for that purpose, where Unity Hall was built in 1891. Like all causes started in the neighbourhood of London, it was necessary at first to obtain assistance, in the shape of an annual grant, from the London District Unitarian Society, but no other congregation has been able to so quickly dispense with the kindly aid that Society renders, for the grant ceased in 1893. Since that date the only outside help has been an annual grant from the Ministers' Stipend Augmentation Fund. The cause is one of the most promising in the Metropilitan area, and the Committee are most anxious to start in their new home free from debt. Considerable progress has been made with the work, and the building is expected to be ready next October. The total cost will be £3,000; towards this £1,710 has been promised, as per annexed list. The congregation has done its best, and now appeals with confidence to the many friends who have the cause of Unitarianism at heart.

Subscriptions will be thankfully received by J. SUDBERY, Hon. Sec., 25, Portland-road, Finsbury Park, N.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Budget laid before Parliament last week by the Chancellor of the Exchequer will have led many people for the first time to realise the magnitude of the disaster brought upon this country, hardly less than on the scene of the tragedy, by the South African War. A terrible blunder, if nothing worse, bringing in its train incalculable mischief and suffering, with as yet no apparent advantage to anyone, the war is costing merely in money double what was spent in the Crimea, and that is the least part of the loss. But we now know something of what we have to bear in crippled resources, and the fresh burden of taxation will doubtless be a salutary reminder of the cost.

A FURTHER appeal has been issued by the managers of the South African Women and Children Distress Fund, of which Lady Farrer, 3, Whitehall-court, S.W., is the hon. treasurer, and Mr. F. W. Lawrence, Mansfield House, Canning Town, E., hon. secretary. With the full sanction of Sir Alfred Milner and Lord Kitchener, Miss Hobhouse has been able to render help in many of the worst cases of distress, but there is great need of further means. Some of the women's camps are indeed well cared for, but in others the distress is very great. Some of the most cruel wrongs of the war have fallen on the helpless women and children, whose condition in too many cases is pitiable beyond description. Cheques may be crossed "Standard Bank of South Africa."

A VALUABLE paper on "The Native Problem in our New Colonies," by Mr. E. Sidney Hartland, will be found in the April Monthly Review. In the Transvaal the proportion of natives to whites is estimated at fully five to one, and Mr. Hartland insists on the vital importance of fuller knowledge if a just government of these people is to be establshed. His article gives abundant evidence of the complexity of the problem and of the extremely narrow limits of our knowledge. Tyranny that is careless of any suffering it may inflict can be satisfied with ignorance, but the British Government is pledged to a more intelligent and humane policy, and the Anthropological Institute of Great Britain and Ireland, and the Folklore Society have presented a joint memorial to the Colonial Secretary, praying that prior to any legislation affecting the natives, a Commission should make full inquiries into their customs and institutions, and their relations to European settlers, in order to make recommendations for both legislative and administrative purposes. Mr. Hartland's article should be read by all who wish to realise the seriousness of the question.

THE Congregational and Baptist Unions have this week been holding united meetings, addressed by their two Presidents, Dr. Parker and Dr. Maclaren, and also by Principal Rainy, Moderator of the United Free Church of Scotland. The meetings were of course densely crowded, and the addresses, our notes of which we reserve for next week, were of the greatest interest. On Wednesday afternoon Dr. Maclaren laid the foundation-stone of the new Baptist Church House, which will have a capital frontage in Southampton Row, with the full advantage of the new Strand to Holborn thoroughfare.

THE Church of England has lost another distinguished prelate through the death, on Monday, of the Bishop of Oxford. Dr. William Stubbs was a Yorkshireman, born in 1825, and from Ripon Grammar School went up to Christ Church, Oxford, in 1844. Forty years later he became Bishop of Chester, whence in 1888 he was translated to Oxford. But the great work of his life was as an historian, the most learned if not the most brilliant of his day. He succeeded Goldwin Smith as Regius Professor of Modern History at Oxford in 1866, and held the appointment until ecclesiastical preferment took him away. Dr. Stubbs will be remembered as author of the "Constitutional History of England" long after his share in the government of the Church is forgotten.

THE April Contemporary Review contains "A Plea for Knowledge," by the late Bishop of London, which is the address which Dr. Creighton was to have delivered as President of the Midland Institute. It will be read with special interest by the supporters of the new Birmingham University, and with profit by all who care seriously for the national welfare. The great defect of England in the present time Dr. Creighton held to be an inadequate conception of the value of knowledge in itself and of its importance for national life. Questions of education awaken only slight interest in the community as a whole.

Take, for instance, elementary education. In spite of all the efforts of a few, it cannot be said that the matter has awakened much enthusiasm in those for whom it was intended. There have been many education questions; there still are; but they have been concerned with mechanism, with administration, with sectarian rivalries; not with the only question with which education is concerned—the best mode of fitting a child for the duties of life.

OUR Indian contemporaries express the greatest regret at the enforced departure, owing to the state of his health, of the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams. They publish the following message from Mr. Williams, who is to sail, on Tuesday next, by the P. and O. s.s. Sicilia from Calcutta:—"I have been pained to be of late of so little service compared with what I was capable of doing a few months ago; and now I greatly regret to bring my active association with our Brahmo friends thus abruptly to an end. But while man proposes God disposes. I rejoice to have co-operated with our Brahmo friends in various parts of India in the arduous but truly noble, redeeming and regenerating work in which they are engaged. I am convinced that the gospel for which they stand is essential to the future religious well-being of India. I shall look back upon my sojourn in India as a period to which I owe a great deal. I trust that the ties of friendship which have been formed will remain unbroken. I hope to be of some small service even from the distant shores of England; and I am quite sure that the British and Foreign Unitarian Association will continue to do all in its power to aid the Brahmo movement. Wherever we may be, may we increasingly realise that the All-surrounding Presence is with us, and that in Him, who is the God and Father of all the families of mankind, we all live and move and have our being."

A VERY well attended public meeting was held in the reading-room of the Highgate Hill Free Library on Thursday week, under the presidency of the Mayor of Islington. Mr. H. G. Chancellor, Chairman of the Library Committee, read an interesting statement as to the Library, which was founded by the late Rev. Robert Spears in 1890, and had been maintained largely through the generosity of the Lawrence family. Islington had repeatedly refused to adopt the Free Library Act, and this was the one Free Library in the district. It had been founded and managed from the first as a public and entirely unsectarian institution, the congregation of the Unitarian Church devoting their rooms for five nights in the week to that purpose, while since 1893 the building had also been a most successful centre for University Extension lectures. The Library now contains 15,000 volumes, and had become so popular that it had been necessary to restrict the enjoyment of its privileges to residents within the radius of a mile. A resolution commending the Library to public support was moved by Mr. A. J. Mundella, and seconded by Miss Eve, and other speeches followed. It was intimated in the course of the meeting that if Islington should be induced to adopt the Free Libraries Act the Committee would be prepared to devote their books to that purpose.

Eighteen months ago we recorded the offer of Miss Frances Power Cobbe to bequeath her valuable library to Barmouth, to form the nucleus of a town library, provided suitable accommodation were secured. The District Council at once took the matter up, the Cambrian Railway furnished a site on a sixty years' lease with nominal rental, and donations towards the building came in from far and near. A building has now been erected, which will be known as the Cobbe Institute, containing not only the town library and reading-room, but club-rooms which will provide the opportunity for wholesome recreation. The Institute was opened on Wednesday, April 10, amid warm congratulations, the Rev. Gwynoro Davies, chairman of the District Council, presiding. Among those present were Miss Hearn (Marianne Farningham) and Miss Blanche Atkinson, two of the trustees of the library. A message of affectionate and respectful greeting and thanks was sent to Miss Cobbe, who was unable to be present.

At the opening meeting an interesting letter was read from Miss Cobbe, dated Hengwrt, April 7. Having offered her congratulations and expressed great satisfaction that the Institute would not only be a fitting receptacle for her library, but a centre of healthful recreation for the inhabitants of the town, the letter continued :—

Possibly it may interest you if I now explain how I became possessed of these books, which will so shortly be yours. It has been partly by inheritance from my friend, Miss Lloyd, of Hengwrt (who, I know, would have rejoiced at my bequest of them to Barmouth), partly by gifts from the authors, whose names (Martineau, Mill, Shaftesbury, Darwin, and so on) will be found in many of the volumes; and partly by my own purchases from time to time for the last fifty years; especially since I have tried to make the collection in some ways more complete and interesting for Welsh readers. But the solid nucleus of the whole—the History, Philosophy, and Poetry round which the other books have gathered, was bought for my own use in my far-distant youth out of what we women call our "pin-money"—in my case the somewhat liberal allowance my father made me for my toilette. It was no doubt an erratic taste (which will probably provoke your smiles), but in the Forties and early Fifties I did most distinctly prefer Books to Balls, and Muse-ment to A-musement, and therefore bought myself a Gibbon when I might have had a Gown, and a Greek Plato instead of a French bonnet! Very happy was I in such pursuits, and it would please me to imagine some boy or girl studying in your new institution, describing their lives now as I did mine at that time :—

"With pure and peaceful pleasures blest speed my calm and studious days,
While the noblest works of mightiest minds lie open to my gaze."

Learning sought for Learning's sake (not to pass examination or turn it to worldly account) is the wealth of the mind, and glad indeed should I be to help some young men and women to this best kind of riches, by enabling them to pursue serious and worthy studies for which, without my books, they might not have found facilities near home. When the hour comes for them to go forth to do their share of the world's work and help to lift some of its burdens, they will find that the knowledge they have hived in their studious years is an unfailing help and strength in every undertaking, and a source of serene enjoyment to the last days of old age.

We learn from De Hervorming, the Dutch "Reformer," that Dr. W. Brede Kristensen, of the University of Christiania, has been appointed Professor Tiele's successor in his chair of the Science of Religion at Leiden. The appointment of a foreigner to such a post seems to have caused some wonder, if not heart-burning, in liberal religious circles in Holland. Dr. Kristensen, it is true, studied for two years under Tiele at Leiden, and has written with great enthusiasm of his teacher, and the Science of Religion is, of course, a subject international in its scope; but still De Hervorming feels that, other qualifications being equal, it is better that the subject should be taught in the chief University of Holland by one who is in intimate touch with the religious life of the people. We must hope that Dr. Kristensen's appointment will be justified, as Max Müller's was long ago at Oxford.

The Athenæum, in a review of Professor Peabody's "Jesus Christ and the Social Question," recently noticed by Mr. Carpenter in these columns, quotes with approval the following passage, as showing a refreshing candour in a book dealing with such a subject :—

Modern business is not, as it is so often pictured, the work of a horde of pirates and wreckers watching for a chance to entrap and despoil the unwary; it is much more like the legitimate traffic of the high seas, where there are many perils of storm and collision, and many disasters wrought by treachery or rashness, but where, on the whole, strong men are trained, and the work of the world is bravely done.

Professor Peabody's main thesis, that Jesus views the social question from above, may, says the reviewer, readily be admitted; "but inconsistencies in the record are not to be overlooked, especially when there is a strong suspicion of Ebionitism attaching to the Gospel of St. Luke."

The annual assembly of the Western Union of Unitarian and Free Christian Churches is to be held on Thursday at Bridgwater, when the preacher will be the Rev. J. Collins Odgers, B.A., of Bury. The President, the Rev. H. S. Solly, M.A., will take the chair at the business meeting, and among the speakers at the evening meeting will be the Revs. A. N. Blatchford and W. Copeland Bowie. Further particulars will be found advertised in another column.

The annual meeting of the Liverpool Domestic Mission Society was held at the Mill-street Mission on Tuesday evening, Mr. Walter Holland, the President, in the chair. A fuller report of this meeting we must hold over until next week.

The Committee charged with the arrangements for the New Century Meetings at Whitsuntide hope to provide an effective answer to the question which has sometimes been asked: "Can Unitarians sing?" At the St. James's Hall service on the Tuesday evening it is intended that there shall be a choir of 300—representative, as far as possible, of all our churches. As showing how warmly and widely the matter is being taken up, we may mention that already Aberdare (South Wales) has furnished six volunteers, Kentish Town sixteen, and Middlesborough three. Other choirs are earnestly requested to send in names as soon as possible. We have much pleasure in adding that Mr. John Harrison (of the Effra-road Church, Brixton), so well known both as an accomplished musician and a devoted Unitarian, has kindly undertaken charge of the musical arrangements, and will act as honorary organist during the week.

Sometimes the question is asked—"What would you do to-day if you knew that to-night would be the end of your life? Would you go apart, lay your task aside, separate yourself and pray, and so be ready for the summons of death?" The nobler feelings of men have always answered: "No, I should go on with the task I was doing—with human work, with helping my friends, only more earnestly, because the time is short. I am trying to leave the world brighter and richer. To do that more faithfully shall be my task this afternoon, if I am to die to-night."—Phillips Brooks.

FROM WRITINGS OF THE LATE REV. WILLIAM BINNS.

The Supreme Moral Law (1881).

Moral laws come to us with the authority of a Superior whose right to rule we at once recognise, and they point to a personal source from which they emanate. They disclose a Divine Superior in whom they have their final and their only adequate interpretation. To their commands we may answer "yes" or "no," but it is really "yes" or "no" to God. Religious minds spontaneously translate the voice of conscience into the voice of God; and a more roundabout yet equally inevitable logic lands us in God as the sanction of utility, and the primal authority on which every other authority, so far as it is moral, must rely for the rightfulness of its sovereignty. Ought, at last, always means God.

Moses and Numa and Mahomet read aloud, with more or less of fulness, the natural language of the conscience. They invented nothing. But they felt constrained to say that they read what God had beforehand written. Imperfection in their readings, and in the readings of barbarians, does not seriously affect the argument.

Deeper than utility, while including it, there is something that utility only partially explains. There is conscience, a faint or bright recognition of the absolute righteousness of the will of God which we are bound to obey, always implied, and, whether openly stated or not, still a living power, and the final interpretation of the authority of morals.

History records the struggles for excellence of character, and failures and successes are memorials of aspiration. But there are no hopeless reprobates in God's family. His election is universal, and in the fulness of time we all rejoice therein, though how soon or how late we ourselves have to choose. Doomed to be so saved as we are, and already saved in the Everlasting Now of the Divine Mind, the accomplishment of our doom is of an uncertain date. But in this world, and in every world, with men on earth, or in heaven, or in hell, the ideal end set before us is the attainment of perfect excellence of character, and the supreme moral law is obedience to the will of God. As the Father commands us, so we ought to do.

From the gift looking to the Giver,
And from the cistern to the river,
And from the finite to infinity,
And from man's dust to God's divinity.

The Permanent and Transient in Religion (1878).

The religious ideas quicken healthy human energies; they consecrate life, and they warrant belief in the ultimate victory of labours for righteousness. God is on the side of equity, and the ideal dreams of the best men. And if the belief that we are working on the same lines of action which have been made glorious by heroes and benefactors strengthens us, much more are we strengthened by the belief that we are working on the same lines as God. If the consequences to-morrow of evil-doing to-day warn us against sin, and the consequences of righteousness help to keep us its fast servants, much more will sin repel and righteousness draw when their consequences last not only for days and years, but for ever. The powers of the world to come enrich Utilitarianism with motives before which its calculations of pleasures and pains dwindle away into nothing. And more and better than that. Immortality is an impetus to endless hope. It confers preciousness on the soul, and secures a harvest-time for our seeds. It interprets the long discipline of humanity, and foretells the harmonious consummation of all in God. Now and then in the might of religious ideas men have gone forth to combat, and the memory of their deeds is our inspiration to seek a like renown. God was the guarantee of Mazzini's faith in progress. "A tyrant," he said, "was the first atheist." Religion implies the reverent treatment of all men; and because they are the potential images of God, it guards their rights and braces them for their duties with a sacred zeal. Morality aims at the same end; but religion, among other things, is morality coloured by emotion, and lasts longer, and is stronger while it lasts. Apart from theological notions concerning Christ, the spirit of life in him would silence the din of war, and arbitrate between labour and capital, and make a family of helpful brethren. More practical Christianity means more justice, more joy, more of a life worth living, and more also of the "golden exhalations of the dawn," and a return of young enthusiasm for the true, the beautiful, and the good.

Matthew Arnold as a Religious Teacher (1878).

There is, as Mr. Arnold is never tired of telling us, and as he has explained with admirable force and ingenuity, a lower and a higher self in man. Roughly speaking, the apostle Paul means these when he talks of the spiritual and carnal natures, and the dogma of total depravity is founded on a misconception of his language. When we yield to the lower self, we blunder and sin and struggle against the constitution of things—we work for transitory and narrow ends where we cannot succeed, and where if we could success would be disaster and ruin, and regretted as soon as gained when once our eyes are opened to our true state. When we yield to the higher self, we are one with reason, with the permanent soul, with the "Eternal Power not ourselves that makes for righteousness," and we work on divine planes, and produce harmonious, enduring, and blessed results. Now between these two selfs a constant conflict goes on, and the soul is a battle-field, and the soul is also both the combatants. It is a mystery. Be it so. We are conscious that it is a fact. The conflict is the process of evolution, and the gradual emerging of the higher over the lower. It has gone on throughout Mr. Arnold's whole career, as it goes on in every man, and it is not yet ended. We may trace it in the poems. baptised with the spirit and with fire, yet passionately eschewing action; in the controversy with Bishop Colenso, replete with far-reaching heresies of his own, yet condemning smaller heresies; and in "Culture and Anarchy," and his various literary and social essays, pregnant, clear, masterly, and approaching perfection, yet marked by petulance and the injustice born of a privileged sect, and putting off realising the ideal he believes in to an everlasting to-morrow. And this is why by turns he charms and repels us. But the higher self has steadily gained power, and asserted its supremacy. He professes to regard his recent religious activity as a fall. It was a new birth. The destiny that mastered him made him speak plainly.

"Literature and Dogma" lacks the acute spiritual analysis displayed in Professor Newman's pure Theistic books. It has not the burning piety and broad grasp and picturesque style of Theodore Parker's "Discourse on Matters pertaining to Religion," and there are in it only comparatively faint gleams of that all-suffusing light of poetry and philosophy which makes Dr. Martineau's writings at once consolatory, inspiring, and illuminating. Most of its true statements we have been long familiar with, and most of its few new statements are of doubtful accuracy. Its main demerit is, that Mr. Arnold persistently takes a part for the whole, and gets at the supposed fundamental idea of Hebrew religion by ignoring or misinterpreting such facts as do not suit his purpose. And its main merit, which is superlative and rare, is, that he brings a fresh and strong lay mind to the study of questions which have been too much confined to professional theologians, and according to his title lets the literary spirit breathe freely and creatively abroad. The merit and demerit might both be guessed in advance. The influence of Laleham, of Rugby, and of Oxford, notwithstanding their parade of freedom and width, were narrow; and the catholicity of nature, and intercourse with manifold historical variations of character, could not entirely counteract them. It is the peculiarity of the Established Church to dwarf the ideal of nationality down to its own level. Mr. Arnold has struggled manfully, and breathed the air of general life; but early recollections surge up in his mind, and then he forgets the wide world for the sake of the ecclesiastical nook where he was born. And hence the union of contradictions in which he glories, and also the two very different characteristics of "Literature and Dogma." The demerit is the old ecclesiastical arbitrariness obstinately refusing to die, and the merit is the genius of literature proclaiming boundless development.

The Evolution of Morality (1879).

We frankly accept the hypothesis, for it is yet no more, of Evolution. It is a Theistic hypothesis, and neither theology as a science nor religion as life suffers from it at all. God remains the Alpha and Omega. Applied to morality, it is full of inspiration. The divine idea was in man, and man had a yearning after God which ultimately shaped itself into an idea of Him from the beginning, from the time that man was man. The sense of right implicitly contained the sense of duty. Both flourished under family and tribal institutions. Brotherhoods and fraternal associations secured for them an extended area of activity. Religion strengthened and sanctioned right conduct with the approbation of invisible powers, and with everlasting consequences following upon the actions done here. Evolution does not, perhaps, paint portraits of our ancestors that we should care to hang among our family pictures. People who would be glad enough to acknowledge descent from Robinson Crusoe, would indignantly disclaim the remotest connection with man Friday. But the theory of development from a primitive savagery akin to man Friday's, is more hopeful than the theory of a fall from perfection to start with, and slow upward struggles, only partially successful, afterward. We begin low, yet with a descent from God, and in less than Adam to grow into more than Adam, and we proceed to the man who is to be.

LITERATURE.

CHRISTIAN TEACHINGS.*

"An altogether admirable guide; as wise in what it omits as in what it asserts." So writes Dr. Clifford in his note introducing this little book to the English public. "It supplies most, if not all, that is essential for the earlier stages, and generally avoids everything that is controversial. It is a living book, charged with a living message expressed in the current speech of the day. The emphasis is on conduct and character. The aim is always practical, rather than theoretic, and the spirit that pervades it is that of Christ."

Dr. Mutch, we gather from one or two references in the course of his work, is an American Congregational or Baptist minister. Deeply impressed with the importance of the religious instruction of the young, he has clearly given much thought to the working out of a wholesome and truly helpful course of lessons; the substance of these pages, in his own use, has stood the test of practical experience, and the lessons are now published, in the hope that they may be useful to others also. It is a hope which we are confident will be very amply realised, for Dr. Clifford's commendation seems to us fully deserved.

In not quite sixty pages there are twenty-five lessons, divided into sections, in which the chief statements are followed by fuller explanation in smaller type, with biblical references, each lesson being followed by questions. The book is therefore not a catechism, but a scheme of instruction, on which the teacher's fuller interpretation and illustration can be based. The ground covered will be best seen from the list of lessons, which is as follows:—About God, about Man, the Need of a Saviour, the Saviour, the Spirit of God, about Living Together, Living Together Well, the Kingdom of God, the Gospel, the Life Eternal, being a Christian, Conduct, Habits, Character, Personal Influence, a Christian Church, Creeds and Covenants, Christian Observances, Worship, Church Membership, Christian Nurture, Christian Work, Charity, Missions, Days and Seasons.

The exposition of practical religion, beginning with the simplest duties, and rising to worship and the special duties of Church membership appears to us most admirable; and no less so the manner in which later dogmatic statements are avoided, and the instruction in regard to God and Christ is kept to the lines of New Testament teaching, in such a way that the young people will be brought to the apprehension of essential spiritual facts, without being puzzled by any Trinitarian formulæ. Unitarians will find that they could not use all the lessons as they stand, as some of the statements would have to be modified in the light of their interpretation of the New Testament; but by far the greater part of the book could be unreservedly and most gratefully used by any earnest disciple of the Master.

Thus in the section on "The Need of a Saviour," the third paragraph runs:—

People need one like Jesus Christ sent from God to show them how much the Father loves them, how ready he is to forgive them, and how hard he tries to save them. "For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have eternal life" (John iii. 16).

It is not easy to know these things of God, unless such a one as He shall show them to us. But at a great cost God tries to make them known to us. It is far easier for one when he knows these things to come to Him and to seek the better life.

And the concluding paragraphs of the lesson are as follows:—

5. We need one who can stand with us like an elder brother, and help us to bear the sin of the past and the testing of the present.

We cannot save ourselves. We cannot long stand alone. The burden of evil in us and about us is too great for that. In one way or another sin always brings grief and woe. We need help not only from each other, but from God, who is greater than all others, for all sin is against Him. It is in Him that we live, and we cannot afford to turn away from Him.

6. We need one who can bring us in our weariness to the heavenly Father, as a good shepherd carries the lambs in his arms to the fold.

Although we are lacking strength and wisdom and courage, we may still have faith in One whom the Father sends to bring us; for without that help we cannot come to him.

Our extracts are printed in one type, but it must be understood that in each paragraph the first sentence is the chief statement, printed in the book in large type, and what follows is explanation, printed in smaller type.

A further lesson on "The Saviour" concludes thus:—

6. He was crucified by those who hated him. He rose from the dead and by his life, death, and resurrection brought to light the way by which we may also rise and be with the Father.

He is our Saviour, and we worship and honour him as such. We have no other. Our hope of eternal life is in him (John vi. 39, 40, 44).

The whole lesson on "The Spirit of God" is Biblical in the best sense, and without any Trinitarian implication. One may accept every statement, and earnestly insist upon it, remembering that our heavenly Father is the eternal ever-present Spirit and Sustainer of our life.

Not less admirable is the lesson on "Being a Christian," of which we are inclined to reprint the whole; but we must be content to give the first and third paragraphs.

1. Being a Christian means being a follower of Christ, or thinking, feeling, and acting in a Christlike way, having been born of the Spirit.

It means more than belonging to a family or class of people who are called Christians. One may have Christian people all about him and still not be a Christian himself. It is a thing which must take place in his own life and character, making it like that of Christ.

3. When one has seen the worse life in its true light, the next step is to overcome it, and to clear away what is sinful and unlike the Christ-life. Here also he needs divine help.

There are evil desires and passions to be subdued, and thoughts and feelings to be corrected, because they are contrary to the Spirit of Christ. There are acts and habits of conduct which must be brought under Christ's law of love. Who is sufficient for these things? (2 Cor. ii. 16; xii. 9). God freely forgives those who turn away from sin and give to Christ their trust and love and obedience, and He helps them to put away every evil thing.

In the lesson on "Character," Dr. Mutch says: "It is by one's character that his real worth is measured both in the world and in the Kingdom of God. 3. "A right character can be secured only by making the heart right, that is, by correcting all the inner man." 4. "One's inner life is corrected or converted by the Christ-life coming in and taking possession. By this means what is selfish and unworthy gives place to what is good." 5. "The formation of a right character is a process of growth in the moral nature, and cannot be done at once, or by any outward word or act." 6. "The chief danger is that one may be satisfied with a fair appearance, which is like the outward life of others, when the inner life is not entirely obedient to the law of love."

These are the chief statements of the lesson without the further explanation, and this lesson is followed by that on "Personal Influence," which concludes with the statement that the best safeguard against the dangers of weakness and evil tendency is "to place one's self under the influence of strong and noble persons, the best of whom is Christ."

Another bit of practical wisdom is in the section on "Charity." "The best charity of all is that which looks ahead and prevents the need of help."

In thus quoting largely from Dr Mutch's pages we have thought that we should best attain our purpose of calling attention to his most helpful little book. It is capable of rendering great service to thoughtful young people, especially when used by a good teacher; and it might also be most profitably used in reading circles, offering guidance and abundant material for the sympathetic discussion of the great questions of religious life and character.

In conclusion we commend the following paragraphs from the lesson on "Church Membership" to the consideration of our readers:—

5. All the duties and obligations which rest upon a Christian and a member of the church would still rest upon him in some form, if he did not belong to the church or profess Christianity.

Our neighbours and our heavenly Father have a right to a full and faithful Christian service from us. In the vows of Christianity we promise to render what is due as best we can, God helping us. To refuse the promise does not relieve us of the duty.

6. One important reason for membership in the church is the help it affords to one who desires to grow into a more perfect Christian character.

Therefore it is not to be supposed that entering the church marks in any sense the completion of Christian character, but rather does it show that the growth is well begun, and has good hope of continuing. Nor may one say that he is not good enough to belong to the church, for it is by the help of the church and of Christ that he can become fit for the kingdom of God, and if he were already fit there would be no need for the church.

PRESENT DAY PAPERS.*

We have more than once called attention to this "Monthly Review for the discussion of modern thought and its application to Christian faith and practice." True to its motto, taken from Whittier, "And all the windows of my heart I open to the day," it continues to be a welcome visitor which we look for with growing interest every month. The April number opens with an article by the Editor, entitled "The Appeal of Religion to the Heart," which, while fearlessly welcoming a salutary criticism of the Bible, to rescue it from "the puerilities of ungoverned exegesis," adds a reminder that criticism is not the end:—

Still, it is true that a man may swear by two Isaiahs, and in his anxiety to hunt down the editorial army which has swallowed up Moses, may colour his Pentateuch till it shames the coat of Joseph, and yet be far from the Kingdom of God.

Do not let us forget that the Bible is something more than a literature. We shall not discover Christ by discussing him and his sayings as we would the plays of Shakespeare, nor shall we find rest for our weary feet in the fact that Job is a dramatic character and not a real man. Love alone can make our Biblical criticism the constructive force which it is destined to be—has indeed in part become.

But not even Biblical criticism, however serious, can discover Christ. To discover Christ is to wrestle in spirit with powers that no mere historical knowledge, still less a passing emotionalism, can overcome. There are, as St. Bernard has said, three kinds of love—the sweet, the wise, the strong. The first is as a gilded image of wood, the second as a gilded image of silver, the third as an image of pure gold. We must desire and cherish the strong love which is pure gold, which will not be denied, though no ecstatic thrill runs through us, which will not rest content with history or literature, or with sensuous imagery, but strives in active service and in prayerful contemplation to realise the glory of the living Christ within.

The second article on "The Fatherhood of God," by Miss May Kendall, is full of searching thought and the truest spirit of religion. There is nothing superficial in this doctrine of the Fatherhood. It is rich in comfort for the heavy-laden, and penetrates into the depths of spiritual experience. We will not attempt to summarise, but will give two passages, typical of the beauty and power of the whole:—

"The steps of a good man are ordered by the Lord." What of the sinner? Why, there is not one step of all his erring way that God has not beset with shame, and guilt, and punishment. Sinners and saints alike choose God. But we may choose God as love and fortitude, joy at the heart of pain, contentment at the heart of strenuous toil, peace at the heart of sacrifice—or we may choose Him as the ceaseless, dim regret that comes to the most hardened—the consciousness that we may stifle, but cannot kill off spiritual treachery—the haunting sense of an immeasurable loss, that turns all earthly gain to ashes and to dust. Even the sins that seem to retard us most are sins that will not let us rest until we rest in God.

This second passage touches on a thought which burdens many hearts in the present time:—

Even blind, dull, and almost hopeless labour, if faithfully performed, brings men nearer God, because it allies them with a principle of the Eternal Life. The thought is worth while, in confronting the great struggle for existence as it is waged to-day. There are myriads of men and women out of whose lives the joy, the passion, the individuality, are crushed by unremitting toil for a bare pittance. . . . We vaguely regard them as necessary, as God's forlorn hope whose bodies fill the trenches over which we pass serenely to a higher life of intellectual, moral, and religious dissipation. But it may well be that the forlorn hope of men is in God's sight a conquering army. Unrewarded, uncomforted, bitterly sinned against, and often sinning, sometimes forgetting God, and unconscious that they are not forgotten by Him—yet they have toiled for one another, and shared the long bleak vigil of hardship and pain, and they have endured to the end. As for those of us who dare to scorn them from a vantage ground of cultured ease and indifference, and selfishness—what are we but mere camp-followers, after all?

Continuing his series of social studies, Mr. H. B. Binns writes on "Ancient Egypt" with notice of Simcox's "Primitive Civilisation."

SHORT NOTICES.

The Literary Year-Book and Bookman's Directory, 1901, edited by Herbert Morrah, is full of interest and of useful information. The frontispiece this year is a good portrait of the late Bishop of London. The main features of the book, with its directory of authors, of artists, of publishers and booksellers, &c., are now well known. The section which contains a selection of reviews of notable books published during the year is new and amusing, if not particularly valuable. Of one book by a popular writer, the following review notes are given:—The Edinburgh Review: "Her work is entirely undeserving of any consideration." Literature: "One can hardly ignore a work of which 100,000 copies have been sold in publication." The Academy: "It is ridiculous, but it is alive. And if you have no sense of the ridiculous, you may well regard it as an impressive and magisterial work." It would be worth the while of a novice to buy the Year-book, if it were only to learn how to correct a printer's proof. (George Allen. 3s. 6d. net.)

Under the somewhat fanciful title of Architects of English Literature, Mr. R. Farquharson Sharp has brought together a series of twenty-four sketches of the lives of celebrated writers, from Shakespeare to Tennyson. It would be easy but useless to complain of the selection he has made; the reader, who would probably have his own preferences, will at any rate find here most of those who are regarded as the great men of our literature. The volume, while giving a series of pleasantly written essays, does not pretend to furnish new estimates of the men or their writings; its chief use consists in bringing together a considerable number of biographical data; its chief interest consists in the reproduction (often unfortunately reduced) of facsimile autographs issued by the British Museum authorities. The work is generally done with care, and a volume well suited for presenting to intelligent young persons is the result. Macaulay's "Schoolboy" will not be misled by occasional slips like Spencer for Spenser (p. 157), and Wharton for Warton (p. 102). We have always been under the impression that Oliver Goldsmith's grave was not, as the author says, "in the Temple Church," but in that nook of ground north of the church where the stone bearing his name now lies. Some good Templar may be able to reassure us. (Sonnenschein. Price 5s.)

YUKICHI FUKUZAWA.

A great man, a great soul, has just passed away from the earth; truly one of Wise Men of the East. As the Magi of old followed the star and bowed at the manger-cradle of a new era, so did this sage see the star of his country rising luridly amidst clouds of doubt and distress, and, following it, beheld the birth of a modern Japan, destined to play a great part in the future story of the world. But not only did he witness its birth. No man did more than, or as much as he, to nurture and train the babe of promise, and now that he has gone, Japan has lost one of its greatest servants and its noblest ornaments.

I fear that few who may read these lines have ever even heard of Mr. Fukuzawa, unless they may have scanned, years ago, such letters of mine as The Inquirer was good enough to insert.

I count it one of the honours and privileges of my uneventful life to have known Mr. Fukuzawa personally, to have partaken of his hospitalities, to have been accorded the honorary dignity of ranking as an employé in his college, and of having received from him the graceful parting gifts customary in Japan, and his presence to bid me farewell at the railway station when I left his fascinating country.

Knowing, as I partly did, what a large place he filled in the affection and reverence of his people, from the Emperor himself down to the poorest and humblest, it was still hard to realise it in his presence. The perfect simplicity of his aspect, his manners, his mode of life; the gentle and cordial smile; the exquisite courtesy which never failed for a moment; all these things made one forget that here was a man whose word could, as it had once done, unseat Ministries, and whose influence was the best leaven in the national life. In the seething turmoil of politics, in the readjustments of old methods to modern demands, in the assimilation of the results of Western science and philosophy, Western commerce and civilisation, he was a higher conscience, a living inspiration, a guiding intellect. Refusing external honours, title, office, and other coveted prizes, he remained the Great Commoner to the end. In his vast school and university, the Keiogijiku, he personally influenced and moulded thousands of the young men of Japan, creating in them the same sense of attachment and loyalty as did Dr. Arnold in the hearts of Rugby boys. By his newspaper, the Jiji Shimpo, he educated his fellow-countrymen to a wonderful extent, shaping the new national life as no other man could have done. His passion for high morality, almost making ethics a religion by his fervour, was a savour of godliness amidst much that was corrupt and degrading in the older Japan.

When, along with Mr. and Mrs. Knapp, Mr. MacCauley and others of our little Unitarian band, I partook of Mr. Fukuzawa's hospitality, he seemed to cast aside his greatness and his many cares, and was almost boyish in his cheeriness. He showed us how a Samurai (a knight) wielded the great two-handed sword, making us shudder at the deadly sweep of it. Disapproving, as he did, of the dangerous vocation of the Geisha girls, he led us, after a sumptuous banquet, into a room with a raised platform, where his charming daughters played, sang, and danced for our entertainment, we reciprocating with English songs and college choruses.

Honestly owning that he was an outsider as regarded religious verities, he was altogether favourable to our Unitarian propaganda, because he saw that it was ethical in its principles and results; and he openly said that he would be glad if we could convert all his students to our faith. In every way he gave us his countenance and goodwill, and his friendship undoubtedly gave a prestige to our efforts which nothing else could have done.

And now he has left the Japan he so loved to work out its future without his personal presence. His word and wisdom will long remain to guide and help, and his name will be held in honour and reverence by generations yet unborn.

The great need of England to-day is men such as he. Our poverty of commanding personalities is our direst danger, When and whence our next leader is to come is the question we all ask. Time only can show. H. W. Hawkes.

PROFESSOR AUGUSTE SABATIER.

"In Sorbonne, at eight o'clock in the morning, to hear Sabatier lecture on the Acts of the Apostles." If I could only find my note-books or diary I fancy I should find some such note jotted down, in the year of that Paris Exhibition that celebrated the centenary of the French Revolution, now some twelve years ago. I am afraid it was some vague mediæval thoughts of St. Louis and his Confessor Robert de Sorbon, and of his hostel founded in 1253 for "poor students and their teachers," that acted as a dim instinct to lead me to choose Paris as the place where I might complete the last stages of my theological education. I scarcely gave a thought to Richelieu and his later building of 1629, and was amazed when I saw the grand brand-new Sorbonne rising to completion in that very year 1889, entirely dwarfing Richelieu's Sorbonne. I never dreamt that the little class-rooms, like cells some of them, were used at times by the "poor students and their teachers" of the Protestant Faculty of Theology, whose own humble abode was in the Boulevard Arago, 83. I also had a vague idea that the Collège de France would meet all my more modern longings, for I knew that its motto was omnia docet. Dante stood diminutive and black at the entrance, and Champollion all glorious within, white and colossal. The last conversation I had with Dr. Martineau, which was begun by his asking me what I was going to do in Paris, helped to scatter some of my mediæval vagueness, and gave me some definite object to make for and a plan to follow. I was advised to find out the Seat of the Protestant Faculty of Theology, and inquire for its Principal, Professor Ménégoz (in those days Professor Lichtenberger was the Dean, I believe).

Under the shadow of this mighty name, and without a letter of introduction (for Ménégoz was not known to Dr. Martineau except by his writings), I found myself at last a kind of semi-demi student in that Faculty, where at that time there were some twenty-three students, mostly poor. Then I began to realise the Alsatian nature of the place. I went to hear Ménégoz preach in German, and only lecture in French. Then I began to discover that Montauban was the hub of the Protestant universe, and that many of the French students seemed to consider Paris as rather a place of exile. It was owing to my acquaintance with a non-Parisian student, a M. Charles Brognard, that I not only always thought of Montauban with increasing reverence, but began to look upon Sabatier as the real soul of the Faculty. It was at one of my very pleasant séances in Brognard's little cell-like room—where I edified him with the Causeries de lundi, and he edified me with Dickens or Thackeray, and when we must have been mutually, and especially phonetically, interesting to each other—that I learnt that the proper thing to do was to go and hear Sabatier lecture at the Sorbonne at eight o'clock in the morning—Thursdays and Saturdays, I think.

Most exceptional things and persons, in the jargon of the students of that time, were either magistral or colossal. But I think Sabatier was too great, too good, and too much really loved to be so easily described. And how can one describe a man who holds you (as Sabatier held his students) by sheer force of mind and heart. He was dark-haired, rather large, somewhat rotund, with a face that seemed placid—almost severe—by mere continuity of thought, not emotional at all, apparently. But why attempt a description? We all know the beautiful face of Helen of Troy, simply because it passed the power of even Homeric description to portray. But a face that could make the hearts of old men beat freshly as a youth's was painted by that very remark that flash from the light of genius, the truest photography of all. And so a man that can make the cloyed hearts of a student beat freshly and welcome the limpid springs of knowledge needs no pen or brush to describe him—he is the born teacher, the born master. And my little romance of Sorbonna was not all an illusion. Robert de Sorbon, up from that village, a "French peasant," too, somewhat I opine, and his hostel and his poor students and their teachers, and their rising betimes—was there not here a miniature replica of all that in Sabatier, a "French peasant," taking refinement like a diamond, his poor enthusiastic students, in a low-roofed unremarkable classroom, in Sorbonne, so early in the morning.

I saw Sabatier at a public examination of students, and at a students' soirée, and also, I think, once at least with his confrères, Vignié, Vaucher, and Ménégoz, when the students preached to each other and to the professors—always a dismal performance, but as necessary, perhaps, as corks in a swimming bath. But Bossuets in embryo are not pretty things, though Alma Mater bears them and bears with them. In these more hardened days of our weary virtue, one learns to regret the too much virtue of our youth, the modesty that made one fear to speak to such a man as Sabatier, and the false modesty that blushed to address him in the shreds and patches of a language that is nothing if not elegant. Yet had I trusted the urbanity of Charles Brognard I might have enjoyed some causeries de lundi not only with that lovable fellow, but with Sabatier whom he loved so much. As it was, my courage only extended far enough to bore patient Professor Ménégoz, the theologian, or rather the saint, and vivacious Professor Louis Marillier, the philosopher. And when my French was a little better and even convalescent, as Ménégoz told me with a seraphic smile, and I could understand Browning's lines—

Oh! the little more and how much it is,
And the little less and what worlds away!

I was, alas! on the point of leaving Paris, that milieu si vaste, and la belle France, and the man I ought to have known most I knew too little. Many are the pleasant memories from that most acceptable year, to me an annus mirabilis, but none more pleasant than the memory of those fresh, quiet, austere mornings with Sabatier in Sorbonne. E. L. H. Thomas.

OBITUARY.

THE LATE MRS. T. CHATFEILD CLARKE.

An impressive funeral service was held at Essex Church, Kensington, on Friday morning, the 19th inst., over the remains of the late Mrs. T. Chatfeild Clarke. The Rev. F. K. Freeston, who conducted the service, delivered a touching and sympathetic address, in which he spoke of the deceased lady's early connection with the Carter-lane Mission, the simple goodness of her life, and the affection for home and family. The three following hymns were tendered by the choir: — "O Lord, how happy should we be," "When the day of toil is done," and "Now the labourer's task is o'er." The chief mourners were her six sons, two daughters-in-law, and her two eldest grandchildren. There was a large congregation present, amongst whom we noticed Mr. and Mrs. F. Nettlefold, Mrs. E. J. Nettlefold (of Birmingham), Mrs. J. H. Nettlefold, Mr. Edward Nettlefold, Mr. and Mrs. Oswald Nettlefold, Dr. and Mrs. Wyman, Mrs. Rooke, Mr. Milliken, Mr. Charles Steer, Mr. Arnold Steer, Mr. J. T. Preston, Mr. Stanton W. Preston, Mr. Alfred Preston, Miss Preston, Mr. and Mrs. Percy Preston, Miss Chamberlain, Mrs. Alfred Lawrence and the Misses Lawrence, Mr. and Mrs. David Ainsworth, Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Martineau, Mr. I. S. Lister, the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, Lady Carbutt, Mr. and Mrs. H. Doughty Browne, Mr. Edward Bromley, Mr. J. G. Pinnock, and Mr. and Mrs. Julian Hill. The interment afterwards took place at Highgate, Mr. Freeston reading the committal prayers at the graveside.

MR. H. W. MEADE-KING.

A memorial notice of Mr. H. W. Meade-King, of Liverpool, which we had hoped to publish this week, has not reached us in time for the present issue. Mr. Meade-King, who was in his eighty-fifth year, died at his residence in Sandfield Park, on April 17. The funeral service, after cremation, was on Tuesday, at the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth. It was conducted by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, and was very largely attended.

THE INWARD LIFE.

From the "Psalms and Litanies" of Rowland Williams.

Lord, who art gracious to them that wait on Thee, be our arm of strength every morning.

Blessed art Thou, who givest labour and rest, our salvation also in time of trouble.

Grant us day by day quietness and peace, while we follow those already called to their rest.

. . . .

Increase and multiply upon us Thy graces: to our faith add virtue, and to our knowledge charity.

With charity make perfect patience, and with patience strength, and peace towards God and man;

That we forget not the Giver of our health, but give diligence to make our calling sure;

That we abound in all works of sincerity, and hold fast the anchor of our salvation.

. . . .

As our fathers who trusted in Thee were holpen and not confounded, so in the need of the times that are, and shall be, be Thou our hope, and that of all generations.

Lighten with freedom the dark places of the nations, and give peace and godliness to the world.

As the round earth is balanced by the counsel of Thy wisdom, so in Thy truth let our minds be established.

God who by His power upholds, by His wisdom enlighten, and by His living breathing give us love.

Guard all our bodies and our souls; with senses healthful and sound, and with actions holy.

. . . .

O everlasting Teacher of mankind, from Thee come the workers of good for ever.

Thine are the revivers of godliness in the world, and the sowers of winged seeds of truth.

Thine, O Lord, is the great company of our ancestors, the sacred truth-tellers, and glorious patriots.

All makers of story and song, and the masters of harmony are Thine, and the pure sufferers for godliness.

Whoever have vanquished evil, and in faith and hope gone through labour for right.

Glory to Thee, Lord, for Thy Spirit in them; and in their spirit let us praise Thee.

Thou Lover of the holy and upright in the east and the west, let us love Thee with unity of mind.

Shall not all nations, each in their tongue and home, because Thy judgments are known, praise the living God?

For the Lord God Omnipotent reigneth now as of old: let us rejoice because He dwells among men.

The humble and meek shall be His people, from whose eyes He shall wipe all tears away.

There shall be no more fear of pain at His hand; neither strife nor crying over prayers; for the evil things pass away.

Lord, perfect thy work in us, and for us: and let us live as children of the Eternal.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

AMPHION—THE STORY OF A WALL-BUILDER.

You have heard of the ancient Greeks who were so wise, so brave, so beautiful that we still go to their writings to get wisdom, to the stories of their heroes to get courage, and to their marble images to see how comely God has made the body and face of man.

In their times people did not live safely in towns or out in the country and come and go as they liked quite as we do. Every city was walled in, and one city often fought against another, and people had to take care to be home before nightfall when the gates were closed, lest they should be caught by their enemies. One of these cities, famous for its brave men, was called Thebes.

Now, in the early days of the place, it is said there was a man named Amphion, who was a marvellous musician. He had a lyre, a kind of small harp, and so sweetly did he play on its strings, and sing to it with his voice, that men said he must be a child of one of the gods, and had learned from them the music of Heaven. Birds fluttered down when they heard the notes, and gathered in the branches of the trees over the player's head. He was safe from the attacks of wild beasts in the forest. He needed no weapon but his lyre, at the magic notes of which their fury was spell-bound. They fawned at the feet of Amphion, and their fierce eyes grew soft and gentle. But something more wonderful still happened.

The houses of Thebes being unprotected the people were preparing with immense labour to build a great city wall. They quarried huge stones out of the mountains, and dragged them down toward their dwellings.

One day while the Thebans were thus hard at work Amphion came down the hill-side playing his lyre. Then his fellows called out to him and chid him for idly amusing himself while they were sweating and toiling. Amphion stood still; the colour rose to his cheeks and he began to play and sing as they had never heard him do before. And lo! the great masses of rock rose silently and slid into their places one above another. Day by day the music-mason returned; day by day to the strains of his lyre the walls grew loftier and longer this way and that until all the city was engirdled.

Was there never such a musician? Yes, and there may be again. You may be Amphion.

Amphion's lyre was his own heart. A heart not a harp. You have one like it. If you play it so as to draw out its sweet harmonies of love and trust you can "move mountains" as Jesus said—mountains of difficulty and misunderstanding, mountains of fear and trouble. You can build round your life, too, walls of friendship and faithfulness stronger even than stone. That is what Amphion did. He played the lyre of his own heart. He struck out notes of sympathy and trust and kindness, and lo! all the masons and labourers worked together with a will. They would do anything, they said, for Amphion. Up went the walls of Thebes without a groan or a murmur, as though the stones were being wafted into their places by music. For love can command where force fails. Love can do easily what loveless hands and tuneless hearts can scarce do with infinite toil.

H. M. Livens.

The April Cornhill opens with a delightful paper on Joachim, by Mrs. Richmond Ritchie. It was in Willis's Rooms long ago that Miss Thackeray first heard the delightful strains of Joachim's violin, "which have so happily sounded on through the latter half of a century of change and perplexity, ever bringing truth and strength and tranquility along with them." Among many reminiscences we find the following picture. Mrs. Horsley, the friend of Mendelssohn, was dying in her house on Campden-hill, and had asked that Joachim should come and play to her once more.

In a dim, curtained back-room, looking across another garden, the dying mistress of the house sat propped up with cushions in a chair. Joachim stood with his back to the window holding his violin, and we sat in silence by the doorway. He played gravely and with exquisite beauty, and the sad silent room was full of the blessing of Bach, coming like a gospel to people in need of rest.

When Joachim first came to England in 1844, as a boy of fifteen, it was with an introduction from Mendelssohn, who said of him: "His interpretation, his perfect comprehension of music, and the promise in him of a noble service to art, will, I am sure, lead you to think of him as highly as I do." That promise has been amply fulfilled, the true nobility of the man and the artist adding always to the whole-hearted enjoyment of his music. One other passage we must have the pleasure of quoting from Mrs. Ritchie's paper:—

We had once the happy opportunity of hearing the Joachim quartet at Dresden. It seemed to me then, as now, that I had never heard music before: so beautiful, so exquisite did it sound in that dark, bare Gewandthaus by the Elbe. It may be a foolish fancy, but to the writer's mind music never sounds so well as when there is flowing water within reach—whether it is best for those who listen by the Rhine at Bonn, or by the Elbe at Dresden, matters little; or shall we write of a Romance of Schumann's, a Concerto of Mozart's, that were sounding but a few days ago in an old Chelsea house? Joachim was not there, but it was his teaching and inspiration that called forth the harmony. One of his most faithful followers was at the piano; his friend and pupil, Mrs. Liddell, had brought her violin. To the writer, hurrying home afterwards with happy pulses, the very mists of winter seemed to bear the beautiful impression along with them, and the tides of the stream to repeat it.

We regret to hear from the March number of the Australian Herald that the Rev. Charles Strong, D.D., of Melbourne, has been out of health. On the last Sunday in January, and for two Sundays in February, the Rev. R. H. Lambley, M.A., took Dr. Strong's place at the Australian Church, devoting part of his own holiday to helping his friend. Mr. Lambley also conducted memorial services for the Queen in the Australian and in his own (Unitarian) church. To the Australian Herald he contributes some notes on Huxley's life.

THE PLEDGE OF CHURCH MEMBERSHIP.

A FORTNIGHT ago, in an article on "Church Covenants," we gave a summary of a most interesting Report recently issued by the American Unitarian Association as the result of a special inquiry into the usage of the Unitarian Churches of America in the matter of their internal organisation. It appeared that the old distinction between the congregation and an inner body of believers forming "the church" had practically ceased to exist in their connection, but that there was a growing feeling that some simple bond should be recognised as forming the basis of union in each congregation. The Report, in summarising the conclusions of the Special Committee entrusted with the investigation, made certain specific recommendations, and among them the following :—

> We recommend the adoption in each of our churches of some brief and simple covenant or bond of fellowship which will express the purpose of the church life.
> We recommend a definite and clearly defined church membership, consisting of those who have accepted the bond of fellowship. Voting on all matters pertaining to the finances of the church should, however, be restricted to those who have made some stated contribution toward the support of worship.

In coming to these conclusions the Report said that it might seem in their branch of the Congregational Church that a new conception of church membership had been adopted, but in reality it was a return to the earliest stage of New England Congregationalism; "to that plain and simple and absolutely unaffected religious attitude" which characterised the first churches established on those coasts. For, in the earliest Puritanism of New England, "there was practically nothing in the shape of a written creed which could be imposed upon the individual by any ecclesiastical authority." In witness of which the covenant of the First Congregational Church of Salem, established in 1629, is quoted :—

> We covenant with the Lord, and one with another; and do bind ourselves, in the presence of God, to walk together in all his ways, according as he is pleased to reveal himself unto us in his Blessed word of Truth.

Thus, it is pointed out, those old Calvinists left the way open for the incoming of new light, as is the custom with modern Unitarians; and that early covenant might be frankly adopted by any of our churches to-day. It would bind together all who desired to belong to the congregation or church, that they might "walk together in all his ways," in the way of true spiritual worship, and the way of brotherhood and beneficent work in the world, but without any inquisition into the orthodoxy or heresy of members. "Membership in one of our churches," says the Report, "no longer means a distinction between the lost and the saved. It means simply a declaration of purpose to walk consciously and openly with GOD, as a loving child, hand in hand with a loving FATHER."

A considerable number of the American Churches have adopted, we are told, with only slight variations in the wording, the covenant suggested by the National Conference of 1889 :—

> In the love of truth, and in the spirit of Jesus, we unite for the worship of God and the service of man.

And this statement of purpose we have seen printed on the calendar of more than one of the churches of our fellowship in this country. Whether any of our congregations have formally adopted this or any other similar covenant as the basis of union, which every member is required to acknowledge, we do not know, but there is much to be said for some such clearly defined pledge of membership.

It will be observed, in the recommendations of the American Committee, the provision is made that voting on all matters pertaining to the finances of the church should be restricted to those who have made some stated contribution towards the support of worship. That, undoubtedly, is a sound principle, that as with taxation representation ought to go, so whoever exercises the right of voting must also take his share in paying the taxes. So the society, from the business side, will be most healthily maintained. But is it well that the only definite requirement of membership should be the payment of a subscription?

It is, we are well aware, an extremely delicate matter, fraught with serious practical difficulty, to suggest any other terms of membership, which should be enforced by the society as a self-governing community. The test of orthodoxy, by which a heretic could be expelled, has been avowedly and most wholesomely abandoned; and the point is not here whether there should be any moral test, such as doubtless those old Puritans most rigorously enforced. The question is whether the church, or congregation, as a religious society with a distinct purpose, would not be strengthened by having that purpose openly avowed, and in the form of a covenant, which every member should be required definitely to acknowledge and accept, before exercising any rights of membership?

There are members of churches, who have joined with the very vaguest thought of any serious religious meaning or responsibility in their membership. They are willing to subscribe—perhaps it is merely because they think it well for their children to have somewhere to go to on Sunday, or for themselves they like the society of the place or some of its week-night activities, if it be merely the entertainments; yet having paid a subscription they can claim the right of membership, and exercise it in the matter of the election of a minister, or other questions vitally affecting the religious life of the church, as to which, perhaps, they are complete outsiders.

Such cases, in many varieties of form, have existed and do exist, introducing unhealthy elements into the church's life. Perhaps the trouble is best left alone, for fear of worse evil in any attempt at discipline that would have the appearance of moral inquisition and might breed Pharisees, and such unsoundness is best rendered innocuous by a larger measure of vigorous and healthy life, instinct with religious earnestness, in the body as a whole. And yet something, surely, might be gained if every church had in its constitution, and in printed documents kept constantly before the attention of members, a clear statement of its purpose as a religious society, which if not enforced by actual signature, might be understood as morally binding on all members, and as such would make its own silent appeal.

And we are by no means sure that it would not be well definitely to require signature of the rules, including such an avowal of serious religious purpose, from each one as a condition of membership, in addition to the payment of a subscription. Certainly in many cases in our community, the church would be greatly strengthened if there were a clearer and deeper sense of the common purpose which must unite the members of such a society, and if the act of joining a church were felt as a solemn pledge of the desire humbly and reverently to worship GOD and to consecrate life to His service.

If the open avowal of such a common purpose were the rule, there would be a clearer direction for the training of our young people, and for the invitation to them, when the time of mature purpose came, to enter into full membership of the church. The ideal of service being more clearly defined, its claim as lofty duty being more deeply felt and avowed by their elders, would appeal to them, and the response, we cannot doubt, would be much more general than it is at present.

Loyalty is strongest where the scope and meaning of a high service are most clearly seen. A church dedicated to the worship of God in spirit and in truth has the loftiest and most beneficent service to render in the world, a service in which every member has his own part, in which each one is bound to add something to the strength of the whole. Every member has his own part to render, in making the reverent quietness of the place of prayer, in deepening the spirit of devotion, and strengthening the union in a true brotherhood. The worshipping society makes its power felt in the world, as witness to God and His truth, and to the strength of His righteousness. But this is only fully accomplished when every member has been faithful in his own place. And where there is true worship and the testimony of the spoken word, there is also work for the Kingdom of God, in manifold beneficent activity. The strong religious society, which can be strong only in the fidelity of its whole body of members, has a great work to do, for enlightenment, for the encouragement of all good endeavour, for the healing of social wounds, the regeneration of the world. When the purpose is clear, it makes an irresistible appeal to the generous heart and the reverent and humane disposition of the young.

In the community of our churches we cannot too constantly or too earnestly insist on the claims of this ideal to the whole-hearted service of young and old alike.

The funeral service of the late Professor Auguste Sabatier, Dean of the Protestant Faculty of Paris, was held at the Oratoire on Monday, April 15, and the interment took place subsequently at Vallon (Ardèche), where he was born. Professor Ménégoz and two pastors, Decoppet and Roberty, took part in the service at the Oratoire, and at the station further tributes were rendered, with sincere and deep emotion, by M. Hébrard representing the Temps, Professor Albert Réville, and others. Sabatier's "Outlines of a Philosophy of Religion, based on Psychology and History," which was exhaustively reviewed in these columns by Professor Upton, early in 1898, was very widely read, and exerted a stimulating and enlightening influence far beyond the circle of professional theologians, and we are glad to learn from Le Protestant that a second volume, the author's "religious and theological testament," is left almost ready for the press. In another column will be found some reminiscences of Sabatier, by one who years ago heard him lecture in Paris.

THE RELIGION OF THE INCARNATION.

Sir,—In his last letter Dr. Warschauer expresses his satisfaction that the difference between us concerning the Incarnation has narrowed itself down to a merely verbal one. I hope it is so; but it is what he lightly calls a "merely verbal difference" that I consider of so much importance. I have contended all along that if he does not accept the doctrine of the Incarnation he has no right to use the term. He can call this a merely verbal difference if he pleases; but I think I shall be able to show it is a great deal more. I have avoided the discussion of doctrine, because I started with the assumption that Dr. Warschauer is the same sort of Unitarian that I am; but I wish emphatically to say that I am not the kind of Unitarian he has been taken to be by some of your correspondents.

I do not know that I should have asked to be allowed to address the readers of The Inquirer again upon this topic had not my admission of partial agreement with Dr. Warschauer already got me into trouble. One of our most eminent ministers has written to me, more in sorrow than in anger, saying that if I really agree with Dr. Warschauer "I must be content to look upon you as of a different religion to myself." I am thus disowned by a minister whom I looked upon as one of my most sympathetic friends. But, then, on the other hand, another minister, equally eminent and quite as good a theologian, has written to tell me he looks upon Dr. Warschauer as "only a 'Parkerite' with phrases."

I think your readers will see the serious disadvantage there is in a writer dealing ambiguously with theological terms when such very different inferences can be drawn from his statements—the one thing which I have been protesting against all along. One theologian, who knows I am a Unitarian of the same school as Mr. Armstrong, assures me he can see no doctrinal difference between Dr. Warschauer and myself; another casts me off because I have not repudiated Dr. Warschauer's "version of Christianity." Which of them is right? I am afraid I must now withdraw any admission of agreement with Dr. Warschauer on any point until the mystery is cleared up.

It seems almost necessary to remind your readers that this correspondence began over a reference incidentally made, in a paper on Church doctrine, to an article in the Seed-Sower (January) entitled, "Christianity, the Religion of the Incarnation." All I said of that article was that its statements might be true, but they had nothing to do with the Incarnation.* I simply regarded it as a well-meant, but ill-advised, attempt to express Unitarianism in terms of orthodoxy.

A much more serious question lies behind, not of Dr. Warschauer's theology or mine, but the practice of ministers saying what they do not mean. Dr. Warschauer described my reference to the "resurrection of the body" as a violent travesty of his position. He could see the glaring impropriety in the one case, but not in the other. It was no travesty, but only another example of the practice to which he had given his approval. The same men in the Church of England who solemnly affirm they believe in the "Incarnation," when they only mean "postnatal transfusion," also solemnly assert that they believe in the "resurrection of the body" when they only mean they believe in the future life. The things are on the same level.

My objection to this practice is something more than "philological purism"—it is a preference for strict veracity in religious speech. If this appears to carry an unpleasant suggestion, I find my justification in the late Professor Sidgwick's book "Practical Ethics." In the chapters on "The Ethics of Religious Conformity" and "Clerical Veracity," he uses much stronger language than I do; referring to the two instances I have mentioned, he says:—

> I had no doubt that these Postnatalists were for the most part making their weekly false statements with the best intentions; but it never occurred to me that they would claim to be acquitted of unveracity in so doing, I rather supposed them to hold that any harm that might be done to religion and morality by this falsity was outweighed by the loss the Church would suffer if men of enlightenment, open to modern ideas and fearlessly accepting the methods of modern criticism, were excluded from its pulpits."—(Practical Ethics, p. 145.)

Is it sufficient to gloss over this unveracity by calling it a new interpretation? Even Mr. Beeby says:—

> It seemed to me at one time, I must confess, that the system of interpretation of the ancient formula savoured of dishonesty.

To many of us it seems so still. It appears to be a device adopted to reconcile the acceptance of heresy with the retention of positions dependent upon the profession of orthodoxy. What is a Unitarian minister doing in that galley?

Dr. Warschauer has several times appealed to Dr. Martineau, but we are not obliged to accept the construction Dr. Warschauer puts on passages from a sermon by Martineau. It is scarcely paying a compliment to Dr. Martineau to say that we are convinced that he would not deliberately have given his sanction to such a practice as I have referred to. Dr. Martineau understood by "Incarnation" exactly what I have contended it means—the birth of a God and not the exaltation of a man. I refer for a knowledge of his views on the subject, not to a semi-poetical sermon, but to the "Seat of Authority," which must be regarded as the final and deliberate statement of his opinions.

After a brief résumé of the chief theme of the Fourth Gospel, Martineau says:—

> From this mere outline it is evident that here we have the story, not of ascending humanity, but of descending Divinity; of a God entering into the disguise of an earthly life, and when the mantle has fallen, resuming his home on high.—(The Seat of Authority, p. 425.)

And remarking on the difference of doctrine between the Synoptists and Paul on the one hand and the Fourth Gospel on the other, he says, on the same page:—

> It is no longer anthropological, lifting a human being into exaltation, it is theo- logical, bringing a Divine being into incarnation.

What incarnation means he has already defined above. But he did not only define, he disapproved. In the last paragraph but one in the second and revised edition of the same work, and therefore almost one of the last passages he ever wrote, he classes the doctrine of the Incarnation with others which he rejected in no respectful terms:—

From the fable of Eden to the imagination of the last trumpet, the whole story of the Divine order of the world is dislocated and deformed. The blight of birth-sin with its involuntary perdition; the scheme of expiatory redemption with its vicarious salvation; the incarnation, with its low postulates of the relation between God and man, and its unworkable doctrine of two natures in one person, &c. (the italics, of course, are mine).—(Seat of Authority, p. 650.)

It is perfectly clear what Dr. Martineau understood the doctrine of the Incarnation to mean.

On another subject which Dr. Warschauer has introduced may I again refer to Dr. Martineau. Dr. Warschauer has referred to Mediation in what has been taken to be the Evangelical sense. Mediation has a natural sense, and is an every-day occurrence; in an Evangelical sense it means that we can only have access to the Father through the Son, and this on every occasion. What Dr. Martineau thought about this doctrine can be gathered from the Preface to the Ten Services (1879), pp. vii. and viii. If Dr. Martineau did not himself write these pages, at least they received his imprimatur. They are too long to quote, but they can easily be found. Elsewhere he sums up his opinion in one brief sentence:—

See how he who threw open the living communion between the Divine and human spirit is set to stop the way and insist that no suppliant cry shall pass except through him.—(The Seat of Authority, p. 359.)

This doctrine of perpetual mediation is included in a string of perversions of the religion of Jesus which Dr. Martineau describes in the same breath as a "dismal stream of horrors." If the terms are a little too emphatic the meaning is clear.

In conclusion, for my own sake, and to guard against any further misunderstanding, allow me to say that to me Jesus is an historical and not a theological person; however exalted his character, however revealing his teaching, however deep and widespread his influence, I can only think and speak of him in human terms. To avoid ambiguity, the mischief of which is so apparent, I never use phrases which are stamped in the mint of orthodoxy. There are certain theological terms which I regard as the peculiar property of the orthodox; as far as I am concerned they are welcome to them, they are of no use to me.

This discussion has occupied a great deal of space in the columns of The Inquirer, but I do not think it is wasted if it exposes once for all the danger which lies hidden in playing fast and loose with theological phrases, which have a well-defined and, to many people, a solemn signification. If some of the clergy, who are practically Unitarian, masquerade in the creeds of the Catholic Church, they should be a warning and not an example to our own ministers.

If Dr. Warschauer believes in the Catholic doctrines of the Incarnation, the Atonement, and Mediation, let him frankly say so; if he does not, would it not be better to refrain from using language which conveys the impression that he does?

Walter Lloyd.

Gloucester, April 22.

Sir,—I have been deeply interested in the correspondence on "Christianity, the Religion of the Incarnation" these last few weeks in your valuable paper, because it was on this subject that I wrote first to the late Dr. Martineau, not being satisfied with the orthodox view myself. The liberal churches have, of course, no fixed view, and your various correspondents have expressed views verging from an almost orthodox belief to a simple theism. It seems to me that Christ is allowed to retain precisely the residue of authority which, according to the believer's view of our nature and our life, is unsupplied from any other source. The Rev. R. A. Armstrong, when he says that through many other agencies—through evangelists, prophets, martyrs; through the glorious ministry of nature; through deep experiences of life and many a whispered message in the soul—we have "divinely proffered means of access to God and life and joy," appears to teach that the residue of authority of Christ's life over many has fallen to the minimum owing to their life being almost completely supplied from these other sources. But, on the other hand, there are a class of liberal thinkers, like Dr. Warschauer, who find in the Christ not merely a teacher, but the revelation of a higher life, the residue of authority of Christ's life over theirs rising to the maximum.

Dr. Martineau, who was certainly the greatest Unitarian of the nineteenth century, was neither afraid nor ashamed of coming perilously near what Mr. Nield calls the orthodox view. He says:—"I have never been able, or indeed anxious, to suppress a certain secondary sympathy with the very beliefs from which I dissent—a perception that they, too, catch by side-lights an aspect of the infinite truth. Looking for ultimate unity, not from the world's coming round to me while I stand still, but from a converging movement of thought, affecting all faithful men, towards a centure of repose as yet invisible." I find in an article written on Dr. Martineau from the orthodox side this statement: "He is a decided Unitarian, although the place which Jesus Christ takes in his theology is a far higher one than that which would be assigned by many who bear the name of 'Unitarian.'" It is this "higher place" which Dr. Martineau, almost beyond any other Unitarian, always assigned to Jesus Christ that has given him such immense influence outside the Unitarian Church. And when I call to mind Mrs. Humphry Ward's words, "That in England the development of Unitarian thought within the century may be summed up in one great name—the name of James Martineau," I ask what place did Jesus Christ hold in his thought?

At his ordination he says:—"I receive and reverence Christ, not merely for his sinless excellence, which renders him a perfect pattern to our race, but as the commissioned delegate of heaven . . . as the chosen representative of the Most High." At the Liverpool controversy, he says: "Jesus Christ of Nazareth God hath presented to us simply in his inspired humanity. Him we accept, not indeed as very God, but as the true image of God, commissioned to show, what no written doctrinal record could declare, the entire moral perfections of Deity." Later on, he says: "Faith in Christ is an acknowledgment of him as the highest impersonation of divine excellence and inspired insight yet given to the world; a trust in him as the only realised type of perfection that can mediate for us between ourselves and God." Still later he says: "In Christ alone is the reconciliation perfect between the human and the divine . . . this once was God's idea purely realised. But the same two natures meet in us all: and he is but the exemplar of a perpetual incarnation—of a living and constant union of God with our humanity." Later still in "Hours of Thought," volume I., he says: "In that supernatural revelation of God which stands unique, 'the Word made flesh'—the divine life humanised, and the human glorified—the blending of both in communion and reconciliation, culminate the intermittent visitations of God: it was not tidal only, it is once for all; and as it was supreme, it was solitary too." Again he says: "We expect no help in our approach to God and ascent to higher duty, except through the hierarchy of greater and holier minds; but we see in Jesus Christ the supreme term in that hierarchy, the realisation of life in God." His final words in "The Seat of Authority in Religion," written when he was over four-score, are: "Jesus of Nazareth, in virtue of the characteristics of his spirit, holds the place of Prince of Saints, and perfects the conditions of the pure religious life; he thereby reveals the highest possibilities of the human soul, and their dependence on habitual communion between man and God." When he was asked for his opinion about the revision of the Prayer-book in use in most of the English Unitarian churches, his answer was: "I can take no interest in any book of common prayer that does not recognise the unique place of Jesus Christ." Does it not seem, then, that the man whom Gladstone pronounced the greatest of living thinkers held that a unique place belongs to the Christ?—"He who lives in us in proportion to our purity of heart did entirely occupy one soul." Christ is God's portraiture drawn by the rays of His own light. "He is the Divine flower of humanity, blossoming after ages of spiritual growth—the realised possibility of life in God."

George V. Crook.

Sir,—All readers of The Inquirer must feel grateful to you for the space you have granted in its columns for the interesting discussion between Dr. Warschauer and Mr. Lloyd. However, even after careful reading of the whole correspondence, and of the letters also published by others on the same subject, it remains somewhat difficult to appreciate accurately the amount of difference between the views expressed on both sides. No one seems to say that the position of Jesus is absolutely unique. Dr. Warschauer actually concurs with Mr. Armstrong in his "glad conviction that through many other agencies (besides Christ) we have divinely proffered means of access to God." Only he insists that "Christ is immeasurably the chief of these means."

No one seems to claim that our assurance in respect to Christ and his mission is resting upon an external, infallible revelation, placing the whole subject beyond reasonable doubt, and commanding assent apart from any conclusions of Biblical scholarship.

But there seems certainly to exist a general sense that our surest, if not our only knowledge of ways divine must be obtained from a progressive understanding of Man. The passage from Dr. Martineau's works which Dr. Warschauer quotes certainly says that "If there is to be any expression of the divine character at all, it can only be through the lineaments of an individual soul passing through a concrete and particular life." What is this but to say that all human efforts to get at a direct knowledge of the Supreme are vain. That all we can hope to do is to read in those higher phenomena represented in this world by human lives something of the Reality which underlies those and all other phenomena? The question, therefore, comes to this: Is our practical knowledge of that Reality to be solely, or at least mainly, derived from the life and work of Jesus (whose mission, Dr. Warschauer says, was "to show us the Father"), or are all men, in a measure, available for the same purpose; in other words, is our teacher, ultimately, to be one Man, or Humanity? The question is a solemn one. It seems easier to say at once "Jesus only," but we must remember that as anthropomorphism has largely entered, especially in the past, into our conception of God, so human ideals have largely contributed to the gradual formation of our conception of Christ. Thus, as the poet could say with abundant reason: "Each age must worship its own thought of God," with no less reason could he have said, I think, that each age must reverence its own thought of Christ. To insist logically upon a definite conception of Jesus, you must be prepared at the same time to insist upon a definite revelation of that conception. Otherwise, men may always ask whether they have reached the real Christ or merely the Christ of Dr. Warschauer. But to endeavour in these days to bracket together the old views of the mediatorial office of Christ with the modern views of inspiration as generally understood in our Free Churches appears to me a hopeless task.

Paul argued with his Corinthian converts that "if the dead rise not, then is not Christ raised," apparently making the fact of Christ's Resurrection to be the fulfilment of a wider law. Must we not, perhaps, pursue the same reasoning further and say that because a divine incarnation is the fundamental fact which explains the mystery of all existence, therefore the Incarnation of Jesus of Nazareth must be a fundamental fact of his life and work?

Then it becomes easier to contemplate in the personality of the Son of Man the august symbol of the Incarnation of the Supreme Reality in Humanity; we can, then, acknowledge fully the place of Christ in our religious thought without excluding from it others who also should have a place in it. As I understand Mr. Lloyd and others who have taken part in this most interesting and important discussion, their main objection is not to the concept of an incarnation, but to the use of a phraseology which seems to limit what the concept, properly understood, does on the contrary enlarge to our spiritual vision.

THE NEW CENTURY MEETINGS.

CONDUCTED PARTIES.

Sir,—I shall be glad if you will allow me space to give some little information to intending visitors about the short excursions to the picture galleries, museums, and sights of London, now being arranged. I hope to be able to publish soon a list of these with the names of the conductors who have kindly consented to take the parties round. Parties will consist of ten to twelve members, and the list of those intending to go having been filled up, it will be closed so far as this special excursion is concerned. The party cannot be increased in numbers, but in some instances there will be two or more parties made up to go to the same place. A short notice of each excursion will be given to every one joining a party, giving the name of conductor, time and place of starting, sights to be seen on the way, time required, and the expense. The particulars of any of the excursions can be obtained on or after May 15, on application to Essex Hall.

Representatives and friends from our country Sunday-schools will, I am sure, find these conducted parties, not only pleasurable in many instances, but also of advantage educationally, as many of the lady and gentlemen leaders are recognised authorities on the objects to be seen and places to be visited.

Inquiries in respect to this branch of New Century Meetings should be addressed to "Excursion" Secretary, here.

HOSPITALITY FOR MINISTERS.

Sir,—The Committee wish to provide hospitality for a great many Unitarian ministers from all parts of the United Kingdom who propose attending the Whit-week meetings in London. May I be allowed a corner in your paper to say that I shall be glad to receive the names and addresses of any of your readers living in or near London who are willing to entertain a minister, or a minister and his wife. Applications are coming in daily, and the Committee are most anxious to provide accommodation for all. As the ministers will be about during the day, the hospitality required will consist for the most part of bed and breakfast.

IRISH SUNDAY-SCHOOLS.

THE LONDON WHIT-WEEK MEETINGS.

Sir,—Kindly allow me to say to ministers and members of Irish churches that my arrangements are now completed, and that the promised circular, with details, will be sent out in a few days to all our Irish schools.

Meanwhile I may say shortly:—

1. An excursion will leave Belfast on Friday, May 24, at 8.30 p.m. (via Fleetwood and L. and N.W. Railway), for London. Fares (third-class and saloon), 33s. 3d. return, available for return any time within sixteen days from date of issue of ticket.

2. Ministers and others who cannot take advantage of the above can leave Belfast on Monday, May 27, at 8.30 p.m. (Fleetwood and L. and N.W. Railway), for London. Fares (third-class and saloon), 35s. 8d. These tickets must be used for return on June 1. The ordinary fare is 45s. 9d.

GLASGOW ST. VINCENT-STREET UNITARIAN CHURCH AND THE INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION.

Sir,—Will you permit us to call the attention of your readers to our Church announcement in this week's issue of The Inquirer? Among the visitors to Glasgow during the ensuing season there will doubtless be a large number of Unitarian friends. Not only do we wish to welcome these to our Sunday services, but we desire to afford them what assistance we can to make them feel at home during their stay in our city. Our church is conveniently situated for those who may be lodging either in the centre of the city, or in the West, in the vicinity of the Exhibition. It is only about ten minutes' by car from the Exhibition grounds, and still less from all the chief railway stations, and best hotels. Intending visitors, who may be strangers to Glasgow, are invited to make such inquiries as their proposed visit may suggest, and these will be answered as promptly and as fully as is in our power.

The Athenæum welcomes Mr. Manning's History of Upper Chapel, Sheffield, as "a valuable contribution to the story of the struggles of Nonconformity in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries," but criticises his statement in the introduction as to the toleration which existed in the church under Cromwell's rule. At that time Episcopalians, Presbyterians, Independents, and (a few) Baptists were alike elected to livings in the Church. Cromwell, says Mr. Manning, "wanted the best men, the most religious men, whatever their ideas on Church government might be." On this the reviewer remarks:—

There is no doubt a certain degree of truth in this, so far as Cromwell was personally concerned, but Mr. Manning has forgotten to tell his people that the use of the Book of Common Prayer, even in private, was at this very time of "widest toleration" a penal offence. What kind of an "Episcopalian" could then be found to accept a Church living, when prelatism of every kind was under the ban, and when he was forbidden under a heavy penalty to use his Prayer-book, even in his own chamber!

Oh power to do! oh baffled will!
Oh prayer and action! ye are one.
Who may not strive, may yet fulfil
The harder task of standing still,
And good but wished with God is done!

SOUTH-EAST WALES UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

The annual meeting of this Society was held at the High-street Unitarian Church, Swansea, on Monday, April 22, 1901, Mr. H. Woolcott Thompson, President, in the chair, and there was a good attendance of delegates and friends, including the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, representing the B. and F.U.A.

The Executive met at 11.30 for the transaction of business. The general meeting of delegates met at 12.0. Reports were received from churches, showing that the work of the congregations had been steadily maintained throughout the past year, in spite of the fact that several churches are still without settled ministers.

The Rev. D. J. Williams, hon. secretary, read the draft annual report, and Mr. L. N. Williams, treasurer, read the financial statement, which was adopted for presentation at the annual meeting.

The following resolution with regard to Bridgend was, after some discussion, adopted, each clause being put to the meeting separately:—

1. Resolved that the Committee of the South-East Wales Unitarian Society congratulate the Trustees of the Bridgend Chapel on the successful termination of the lawsuit brought against them by the Rev. W. Parry.

2. Resolved that the Trustees be informed that the Committee of the South-East Wales Unitarian Society, in co-operation with the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, are prepared to take charge of the chapel at Bridgend for a time, and to provide preachers on the understanding that the Trustees will put the building in a proper state of repair and contribute towards the payment of pulpit supplies.

3. Resolved that the Trustees of the Bridgend Chapel be requested to confer with the committee of the South-East Wales Unitarian Society before proceeding with any scheme in the event of the income exceeding the amount required for carrying on the services at Bridgend.

4. It was further resolved to forward a copy of these resolutions to Mr. W. Arthur Sharp, Secretary of the Trustees, and to the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, Secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

The annual meeting of the Society was held at three o'clock, Mr. H. Woolcott Thompson, presiding.

The Rev. D. J. Williams, hon. sec., presented the annual report and reports from the churches. The financial statement read by Mr. L. N. Williams, treasurer, showed a small balance in hand.

The Chairman moved the adoption of the report and financial statement, and this was seconded by the Rev. Professor J. H. Weatherall, and adopted.

Mr. H. Woolcott Thompson was re-elected president; Mr. L. N. Williams was re-elected treasurer; and the Rev. D. J. Williams and Mr. John Lewis hon. secs.

Mrs. Lewis read the report of the Postal Mission, which had done much good work. It was stated that one of the Welsh papers, Genol Cymraeg, had refused to insert their advertisement.

Mrs. Reid, of Swansea, mentioned the fact that the Swansea Church had a mission of its own, and that work was carried on very successfully here.

On the motion of the President of the Postal Mission, the report was adopted.

The proposal to establish an Advisory Committee having been under consideration for the last two years, the recommendations of the Sub-committee appointed to consider the question, and the rules drawn out by that Committee were adopted. This Advisory Committee will be composed of representatives of the two Welsh societies. The president, Mr. H. Woolcott Thompson, the treasurer, Mr. L. W. Williams, and Mr. John Lewis, hon. sec., were appointed to represent the Society on the Committee.

The congregation at Fylosstown, having made an application through its minister, was admitted as one of the congregations recognised by the Society.

Resolved that "the deep sympathy of the members of this Society be extended to the relatives of the late Mr. J. Guppy in their sad bereavement." The late Mr. Guppy had been for many years a faithful member of the Swansea congregation.

At seven o'clock a religious service, conducted by the Rev. W. J. Phillips, was held, and impressive addresses were delivered by the Revs. W. Copeland Bowie, Professor Weatherall, B.A., and J. T. Davies, B.A.

Luncheon and tea were kindly provided by the Swansea congregation, to whom the best thanks of the Society are due for their generous hospitality.

The Ministerial Fellowship.—The second annual meeting of the members of the Ministerial Fellowship was held on Monday, the 22nd inst., in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, the President, the Rev. C. T. Poynting, B.A., in the chair. A most satisfactory report and financial statement were presented and adopted, the balance in hand amounting to £169 18s. 8d. Twelve new members were elected, bringing the total number up to ninety-two. Fraternal greetings and sympathy were voted to the Rev. Joseph Harrison, who is still laid aside from ministerial work through illness. The Rev. James C. Street (Shrewsbury) was appointed president, the Rev. Dendy Agate, B.A. (Altrincham), treasurer, and the Rev. C. J. Street, M.A., LL.B. (Bolton), secretary. The Revs. T. Lloyd Jones (Liverpool), T. P. Spedding (Rochdale), and E. W. Lummis, M.A. (Warrington), were elected to fill vacancies on the Committee, and the Rev. W. R. Shanks and Mr. A. E. Piggott, F.S.A.A., were re-appointed as auditors. A paper was read by the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, B.A., on "The Extension of the Scope of the Ministerial Fellowship," and an interesting discussion followed. Ultimately the Committee were instructed to prepare suggestions as to methods of further mutual help which the Fellowship might profitably adopt.

We move about even in this visible sphere in worlds not realised. So it is in our domestic life—in the communities of the hearth and the home. The cares of each day are too apt to fill our hearts as it were with dust—the petty anxieties, the petty difficulties, the trivial round, the tedium, the monotony of the weeks, dull our sense of what is beautiful. And then perhaps death comes and our imaginative power is liberated—too late for its best uses and we recognise the hidden lines of beauty, and perceive in its fulness the half apprehended joy. Happy is he who discovers, with the aid of a wisely informed imagination, the beauty of his own daily life.—Dowden.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

YORKSHIRE UNITARIAN UNION.

When we met for the first time to make our plans for carrying out our New Year's Day resolution to begin the century with a general Forward Movement in our big county, we immediately encountered the difficulty of all movements—how to find a capable man who would take upon himself the work, the responsibility, and the inevitable blame, and be content to dispense with any outward reward of praise or pay.

For a moment it really seemed as if there was nobody who could and would be secretary, when the latest comer among us stepped forward and offered his services, which were gladly accepted. I have asked him for a report as he had the whole movement under his observation, and I give it as I have received it from him. It strikes me, indeed, as a little too optimistic in tone, but this, if a fault, is on the right side. It is certain that the mission has nowhere been a failure. We have indeed failed, like our Nonconformist brethren of the Trinitarian churches, in drawing outsiders inside our church buildings; but we have done better than that if we have drawn our own scattered people together and put heart of hope into them. The mere fact that provision was made for the exercise of whatever latent energy and enthusiasm the congregations possessed was in itself sufficient justification of the mission. We have lost many ardent souls in time past owing to their finding nothing to do among us. It is work which keeps a congregation together and gives it the power of attracting individuals from outside to its membership.

It was because our Halifax folk have always (or certainly since Mr. Millson came amongst them some thirty years ago) had their hands and hours full of work, that they declined to take part in the mission. People who are conscious of doing as much they can cannot do more, and I know of no congregation which does so much as that of Northgate End Chapel. One could only wish they did it a little more in conjunction with other Yorkshire churches; their zeal and intelligence would be welcome at all our meetings. At Mill Hill, also, it was not considered desirable to hold special mission services, as the church is very unfavourably situated for week-day evening meetings, situated as it is in the very centre of the business quarter of the city. The services of the minister were placed at the disposal of the Committee, and he did all he could to help in the work.

It is to be hoped that this effort, the first of its kind in our county, will have done something to supply what has hitherto been so sadly lacking among us—a sense of the common interests which unite all our congregations humblest and highest in one body. Your own columns, Mr. Editor, bear witness to the wide divergence of opinion among us even on questions of vital importance. And yet there are certain principles on which we are, it is to be hoped, all agreed. Here in Yorkshire we are happily free of all theological disputes. I presume we differ somewhat in our opinions, and are quite content to differ, but our agreement is emphatic and cordial. It is, so far as I know or have heard, the same gospel which is preached from all our pulpits, the same manner of prayer which obtains in all our congregations. We ought to be a happy and united family, and should be, I think, were it not for the mean and paltry consideration of distance from one another and expenses involved in communication. I have often thought that no better endowment of our Union could be devised than would be a sum of money, the interest of which should be devoted to paying the travelling expenses of ministers coming together for committees, or business or social meetings, or religious services. Meanwhile this county mission has done some little good in making us better acquainted with each other's congregations and circumstances. I trust it is only the first of many and far more successful Forward Movements during the coming century.

The report of our able and enthusiastic secretary, the Rev. Charles Harvey Cook, of Holbeck, is as follows :—

"A Committee of the Yorkshire Unitarian Union elected for the purposes of a 'Forward Movement,' have been enabled, thanks to the generous and cordial co-operation of the county ministers and churches, to carry through, during the month of March last, a very successful series of devotional services and special lectures. The objects aimed at by the Committee were the deepening of piety, the consolidation of our present churches, and the propagating of what we affirm. These purposes have been kept steadily in view, both by the missioners and the various churches, with results which have given inspiration to the local societies, and encouraged those engaged in the work.

"Practically, the whole county has been 'missioned,' special efforts being made to strengthen the outposts of our order of faith in Yorkshire.

"More than 100 special services have been held, and the welcome extended to the minister or lecturer, as the case might be, could not have been more hearty or sincere.

"Beginning in a spirit of trepidation and of doubt as to the wisdom of so unusual a procedure within our borders as a mission, the ministers and churches soon caught the contagion of enthusiasm, and we have to thank God for a marked quickening of religious life and fervour, and an awakening of our congregations to a keener interest in the best welfare of their fellows.

"By the hiring of halls and rooms, where the public could meet on neutral ground to hear what our lecturers have had to say, real propaganda work has been done, the attendance being very encouraging, and the spirit of reverent inquiry upon religious matters most marked.

"Large posters were exhibited by most of the churches, and members of the congregations were formed into working committees for the distribution of small handbills and cards of invitation to the services.

"The distribution of literature, illustrative of our way of interpreting the Bible, and setting forth the Evangel of the Gospel in Unitarian terms, cannot, the Committee feel, have been without beneficent results. To see our Church-workers busily distributing these booklets and pamphlets, and to notice the eagerness with which the public read them, was a prophecy that 'Whoso runneth may read.'

"House to house visitation was undertaken by several of the churches and carried through in no lazy fashion, the reception given to the visitors always unfailingly being most courteous and kind. That we did not jest the multitude is certain, but, on the other hand, the special labours have convinced a vast number of people—who thought we wanted to go to heaven alone—that after all they have made a mistake, one article of our faith being 'Heaven is not heaven for us alone.' Beyond this the display of well-disciplined zeal on our part has impressed the people with the fact that we are really anxious to give our neighbours 'A lift on the way.' The immediate benefit to the churches is not, naturally, in enlarged congregations, though even in this matter we are not without witness. A few have joined us who were outside two months ago.

"The effect of the Forward Movement upon some of our congregations has been very certain; they have pledged themselves to attend public worship more frequently, to get others, who attend no places of worship, to come with them and to raise at least £20 more towards church funds during this year.

"In other instances, interests long dormant have been vitalised, and by means of social gatherings, the cost of which being cheerfully borne by some thoroughly interested man or woman, or both, old scholars of school and members of the congregation have been brought together and a new life infused into the church.

"Causes that were drooping are beginning to flourish, a spirit of healthy activity is exhibiting itself, whilst the manifold schemes on hand indicate purposefulness and vigor.

"The Committee undertook to supply the ministers and the lecturers for the churches, and to pay all travelling expenses, providing county ministers were selected as visitors, and with this condition all the churches cordially agreed, the ministers and lecturers giving their services gratuitously. Collections have been made in some churches for the Funds of the March Mission, so that, as the local bodies did all the printing, posting, &c., and bore the cost, the central funds of the Union, it is hoped, will not have been drawn on at all.

"The amount of energy and goodwill put into the special effort by the churches and every one associated with it has been most admirable, and looking back over our brave doings, and calling to mind the pleasant memories clustering around it, we feel constrained to say, that the day of the Unitarian Church is not past, but is to come."

So writes one whose years are not so many but that he may hope to see the good time coming, though it be delayed yet twenty years or more.

Charles Hargrove.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Birkenhead.—A special meeting of the congregation of the Unitarian Church was held on Sunday, 14th inst., and after morning service to adopt the following resolution, which was proposed by Mr. G. H. Willmer :—"The members of the congregation of the Birkenhead Unitarian Church have heard, with much regret, of the death of the Rev. William Binns, who for twenty-five years was their able and valued minister. They desire to bear their testimony to the worth of his fearless and powerful advocacy of the great truths of spiritual religion, to his strenuous exertions in the philanthropic and intellectual interests of the town during the whole time of his residence therein, and to the value of his labours among those who attended the church during his ministry." Personal tributes to the character and work of the Rev. W. Binns were paid by Mr. Willmer, and by Miss Cooke, who seconded the resolution, which was passed by the congregation standing.

Bolton : Bank-street.—The new American organ for the Sunday-school was dedicated on Sunday, the Rev. C. J. Street preaching at a special afternoon service. To-morrow (Sunday) anniversary services are to be held in the chapel, the preacher, morning and evening, being the Rev. J. E. Manning, of Sheffield, while a special afternoon service is to be conducted by the Rev. H. W. Turner, of the Mawdsley-street Congregational Church.

Gloucester.—At the celebration of the Jubilee of the present Southgate Congregational Church, on Tuesday, April 16, Dr. John Brown, of Bedford, gave a lecture on "The Revolution of 1688 : its Causes and Consequences." At the opening of the proceedings the hymn, "We come unto our Father's God," was sung, after which prayer was offered by the Rev. Walter Lloyd.

London : Lewisham.—The Literary and Scientific Society in connection with the Unitarian Church has just completed its fourth year. There have been twenty-five weekly meetings during the session 1900-1, with an average weekly attendance of over 100. Our friends are proud of this society, for it is already acknowledged to be a power in the neighbourhood, and, happily, a great many young people are included in its membership

North Cheshire Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The annual conversazione was held at Mottram on Saturday last. The Committee met before tea, and, inter alia, appointed the Rev. N. Green, delegate to the London May Meetings. Favoured with fine weather, the meeting was very successful, about 300 persons being present. After tea the President (the Rev. T. R. Elliott) occupied the chair, being supported by the Revs. H. E. Dowson, N. Green, and W. R. Shanks ; Mr. E. B. Broadrick and Mr. A. Slater. Mr. Shanks, who attended as a representative of the Manchester District Sunday School Association, during the evening delivered a most interesting address on the problem of Sunday morning schools. The following resolution was carried in silence by the meeting, on the motion of the Rev. H. E. Dowson, seconded by the Rev. H. S. Tayler :—"That this meeting of the North Cheshire Unitarian Sunday School Union desires to express its sympathy with the family of the late Mr. John Barron, and with the school and chapel with which he had a life-long connection, in the loss they have sustained by his death. They desire to place on record their appreciation of the interest and zeal he displayed in the work of the Union, of his loving service of God and man, and especially of his long labours for the children of this Sunday-school." An excellent vocal, instrumental, and dramatic programme was rendered by the Mottram friends, and at the close hearty votes of thanks were accorded to the Mottram friends, to Mr. Shanks, and to the Chairman, and duly responded to.

Pentre : South Wales.—In response to an invitation from the Mardy United Temperance Committee, the Rev. D. Rees lectured on "Temperance" in the Baptist Church of the above place on 15th inst. He was followed by the Rev. J. Tertius Phillips, the agent for Wales of the United Kingdom Alliance. A very successful social tea was held in the chapel on Thursday week. Anniversary services are to be held on Sunday next, the Rev. J. Hathren Davies being the officiating minister.

Sheffield : Upperthorpe.—The ladies of the Unitarian congregation gave an At Home in the schoolroom on Monday, April 13, when a very good musical programme was given by friends, and dramatic performance, Bubbles. During an interval Mrs. Ellis was presented with a purse, containing £28, subscribed by members and their friends. The presentation was made by Mrs. Alleson, the oldest member of the Sewing Society, who spoke of the warm feelings entertained towards Mrs. Ellis, and said their gift was neither a gold watch nor a silver tea service, but it was something that would procure such things if wanted.

Stourbridge.—A successful Sale of Work was held in the boys' schoolroom of the Wollaston-road Schools, on Monday, April 15, for the purpose of raising funds towards the building of a church parlour for the Presbyterian Chapel. The sale was opened by Mr. Charles Harding, of Birmingham, being introduced by the Rev. A. W. Timmis, who explained the object of the sale. Mr. Harding, in a genial speech, expressed his sympathy with the effort, and a vote of thanks, proposed by Mr. A. W. Worthington, and seconded by Mr. F. Taylor, was cordially passed. It is hoped that the net result will be not less than £60.

Swansea.—On Sunday anniversary services were held in the Unitarian Church, the preacher being the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, who in the evening gave an exposition of Unitarian beliefs to a large congregation. On the following day Mr. Bowie also took part in the annual meeting of the South East Wales Unitarian Society, of which a report will be found in another column.

Trebannos: Swansea Valley.—The usual biennial services were held on Sunday and Monday, when the two oldest ministers (oldest in active service) officiated—namely, the Revs. R. J. Jones (Aberdare) and J. Davies (Alltplaca). In the four services six sermons in all were given, and the attendances seemed to grow as they went on. Nearly £25 were taken at the collections, and this will be applied to the liquidation of the somewhat heavy debt which still remains.

Warrington.—The newly-appointed minister of Cairo-street Chapel (the Rev. E. W. Lummis, M.A.) and Mrs. Lummis were formally welcomed by the congregation at a recognition meeting which was held in the schools on Tuesday evening, 16th inst. There was a very large attendance. The proceedings were commenced by tea, after which a meeting was held under the presidency of Mr. F. Monks, J.P., amongst those present, in addition to Mr. and Mrs. Lummis, being the Revs. H. E. Dowson (Gee Cross), Dr. Klein (Liverpool), Charles Hargrove (Leeds), J. C. Street (Shrewsbury), F. K. Freeston (London), Charles Peach (Manchester), Mr. William Long, J.P., Mr. T. Birchall, J.P., Alderman Monks, J.P., Mr. J. H. Knowles, Mr. John Gandy, Mr. J. Ewart, Mr. H. S. Knowles (school superintendent), Mr. W. H. Woodcock (treasurer), and Mr. Joseph W. Davies (secretary). Letters of apology for non-attendance were read from the Rev. W. H. Drummond (Belfast), the Rev. John Yonge, and the Rev. T. Bishop. Mr. Long gave the welcome to Mr. and Mrs. Lummis on behalf of the congregation, Mr. H. S. Knowles following on behalf of the Sunday-school. Further remarks were also made by the Chairman, who explained that the congregation had not invited a minister to come amongst them merely to be the echo of their thoughts, but as a reverent thinker, to give them the best that there was in him. Several of the ministers present joined in the welcome, and Mr. Lummis spoke in response. During the evening the choir, under the direction of Mr. Muir, gave an excellent selection of music, which was much enjoyed and appreciated.

Society for the Abolition of Vivisection

Offices: 62, Strand, London.

"I have been acquainted with the practice of Vivisection for upwards of forty years. I well remember the experiments which I first witnessed, performed under skilful hands, but which were thought by a select audience of medical men to be cruel and without sense. Pigeons were shaved, and their brains frozen and twirled about in all directions. My next experience was with dogs in the laboratory of a London Hospital, where these defenceless creatures were cut about and injected with 'stuffs' to their terrible pain and suffering. And after forty years, what is the result? I do not know that I have received one atom of benefit on behalf of my patients for all the cruelty I witnessed."—J. MAKINSON FOX, M.R.C.S.

NEW UNITARIAN CHURCH AT WOOD GREEN.

AFTER ten years which have elapsed since Unitarianism was first planted in Wood Green, it has been decided to erect a Church, on the land reserved for that purpose, where Unity Hall was built in 1891. Like all causes started in the neighbourhood of London, it was necessary at first to obtain assistance, in the shape of an annual grant, from the London District Unitarian Society, but no other congregation has been able to so quickly dispense with the kindly aid that Society renders, for the grant ceased in 1893. Since that date the only outside help has been an annual grant from the Ministers' Stipend Augmentation Fund. The cause is one of the most promising in the Metropolitan area, and the Committee are most anxious to start in their new home free from debt. Considerable progress has been made with the work, and the building is expected to be ready next October. The total cost will be £3,000; towards this £1,710 has been promised, as per annexed list. The congregation has done its best, and now appeals with confidence to the many friends who have the cause of Unitarianism at heart.

Subscriptions will be thankfully received by J. SUDBERY, Hon. Sec., 25, Portland-road, Finsbury Park, N.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE fifty-first annual meeting of the London District Unitarian Society was held at Essex Hall on Thursday evening. A special interest attached to the meeting in connection with the retirement of Mr. David Martineau from the office of treasurer, which he had held for thirty years. A full report of the meeting will appear next week.

THE Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, M.A., is to take the chair at the annual meeting of the London Domestic Mission Society, and he will be supported by the Rev. J. Edwin Odgers, M.A., of Oxford, Mr. F. W. Lawrence, M.A., Mr. W. Wallace Bruce and the Rev. F. K. Freeston. The meeting is to be held on Tuesday evening in the schoolroom of Essex Church, and will, we trust, be very largely attended.

WE have referred in another column to the united meetings of the Baptist and Congregational Unions held in London last week. The annual business meeting of each Union was held separately, but the two presidential addresses were delivered to united meetings in the City Temple, Dr. Maclaren, President of the Baptist Union, giving his address on Tuesday, and Dr. Joseph Parker, of the Congregational Union, on Thursday. Both addresses sprang from a confession of need and the desire for more effective and fruitful religious work. Dr. Maclaren pleaded for more powerful preaching, Dr. Parker for closer union among the churches, for the better organising of their power for good. "I suppose," said Dr. Maclaren, "there are some 6,000 or 8,000 sermons delivered every Sunday by the ministers of our two denominations—and what comes of them all? We have covered the land with chapels, and yet do we even keep up with the growth of population? "We have sowed much and brought home little." And asking why this should be so brought him to his theme of the need of better preaching.

THE preacher, Dr. Maclaren declared, must in these days be three things: he must be an evangelist, a teacher, and a prophet. He must declare the Gospel to men, he must make them understand it in all its wide bearings, and he must rouse in them the passion of righteousness, which will bring the truths of the Gospel to bear upon the present needs of the world. Answering an objection that the preacher is not now needed as a teacher of men because the Press does that work far more effectually, Dr. Maclaren said:—

> The men and women of this generation, we are told, form their opinions from books, not from sermons. I should demur to the word "form," as expressing the process by which a large proportion of them arrive at what they call their opinions; I should consent to say "get their opinions," for it is not a process of reasoned formation, but of more or less accidental and unreasoned acquisition. The opinions do not grow, are not shaped by patient labour, but are imported into the new owner's mind ready made, "in Germany" or elsewhere, but certainly not in his own workshop. But granting the influence of the Press, if it supersedes the pulpit, it is the fault of the occupant thereof. A certain minister once told a shrewd old Scottish lady that he was engaged to deliver an address on the power of the pulpit, and asked what her views on the subject were. She answered: "The power o' the pulpit! That depends on wha's in it." Which is a truth to be laid to heart by all preachers. No man is superseded but through his own deficiencies. There must be weakness in the wall which the storm blows down. The living voice has all its old power to-day, when it is a voice and not an echo or a mumble. If a man has anything to say, and will say it with all his heart and with all his soul and with all his strength, he will not lack auditors. Books have their province and preachers have theirs, and neither can efface the other or supply the place of the other.

As to the quality of the teaching to be given Dr. Maclaren pleaded for "the strong, sympathetic presentation of positive truth," which should be simply given, since the bulk of the hearers in any congregation are not people of trained understanding; and he recalled Luther's advice to one who was to preach before the Duke: "All your sermons should be of the simplest. Do not regard the prince, but the simple, stupid, rude, and unlearned people, who are cut out of the same cloth as the prince. If, in my sermon, I were to have Philip Melancthon and the other doctors in my eye, I should produce nothing good, but I preach in the simplest way to the unlearned, and it suits everybody." And Dr. Maclaren continued:—

> Some of our hearers are educated and can follow our highest flights, but many of them cannot. But all have the one human heart, with its deepest needs identical in all. Sad souls are to be comforted, torpid ones to be stung or startled or wooed into sensitiveness and activity, eyes glued to earth to be drawn to look up, the inmost self which is ever in its depths lonely to be led to the Immortal Companion and lover of all souls, the consciousness of the bondage and burden of sin to be roused, and, when roused, to be soothed—and the preacher is to do all this! Surely the vision of the needs of a gathered audience might strike the most eloquent dumb, and make the most confident timid. But "our sufficiency is of God," and God's sufficiency will be ours, in the measure in which we steadfastly follow out the purpose of making our preaching truly Biblical. If we draw from these deep fountains, we shall never return with our vessels empty.

FOLLOWING the first united meeting of the Baptist and Congregational Unions on Tuesday week, an evening demonstration was held in the Queen's Hall, at which the principal speakers were Dr. Fairbairn, of Oxford, the Rev. J. G. Greenhough, and Dr. Horton. Dr. Fairbairn spoke earnestly of the conviction of the two bodies on the subject of baptism. "Their differences," he said, "were great and distinctive, but they were not divisive." Proceeding to deal with the practical application of religion to the needs of social and national life, he concluded with this impassioned appeal:—

> What need we as a Parliament save magnanimity? what need we as a nation save supreme obedience to the law of Christ? I appeal to you as representatives of the Free Churches without any offices to guard but with a Christ to preach; without any succession to maintain save the succession of the eternal life in the soul of man; without any aim save the aim of supreme obedience to our invisible and sovereign Head—to rise up in your thousands, in your churches, to live unresting, unhasting, resolved to build Christ's Kingdom in England's green and pleasant land.

MR. GREENHOUGH spoke as an "incorrigible optimist," but lamented the present dearth of leaders in the political world as among the poets and preachers. Dr. Horton followed with a plea for three things, which, he said, were not very popular just now—the inward, the ethical and the supernatural. Speaking of those who kept the waters of the spiritual life from growing brackish, he referred to the growing influence of Emerson in America, and of John Pulsford in this country, and then to a well-known writer in the Christian World, "the man who modestly conceals himself behind the two letters 'J. B.'—a man whom God mercifully took out of the pulpit, where it is so difficult to possess your soul, and enabled him to enter into the soul, that he might give us 'Studies of the Soul,' and thousands of people are praising God for it. These shy, or lonely, or inward spirits are not popular. They do not often appear on platforms, and if they do they do not always make a great impression, but they are the hills from which the refreshing waters flow."

SORROWFUL reference was made at the meetings of the Baptist and Congregational Unions last week to the martyr death of James Chalmers, an honoured missionary of the London Missionary Society, who with a young companion just entering on the field and a number of native attendants, has been murdered in New Guinea. He had gone, it seems, to make peace in a tribal war, and thus fell as a faithful witness to the Prince of Peace. Chalmers was a veteran in the field, a Scotchman born in 1841, a man of noble presence and great enthusiasm, trained at Cheshunt, whence he went out in 1865 to Raratonga, and in 1877 to New Guinea. "We ask for no gun-boat to avenge the massacre of the missionaries," said Mr. Sylvester Horne at the United Missionary Meeting in the Albert Hall, "we demand no compensation. We did not commit ourselves to the work of Christian missions without having counted the cost." Such a martyrdom will undoubtedly kindle new passion for this self-sacrificing work.

SUNDAY week, May 12, has been fixed as "Assembly Sunday," for the Provincial Assembly of London and South-Eastern counties, when it is hoped that collections will be made in as many as possible of the congregations of the province. In some cases other arrangements oblige a congregation to hold the collection on another date, but the simultaneous effort is always helpful.

THE current number of the Windsor Magazine contains an illustrated article by the Rev. Peter Dean, of Walsall, on "The Midland Truant School" at Lichfield, established about seven years ago by the School Boards of Burton, Walsall and West Bromwich. Mr. Dean describes the admirable arrangements of the school and tells the story of its success, marked by the fact that boys are now sent there by School Boards all over England, London supplying the largest number. One of the illustrations (which are chiefly from photographs taken by Mr. Dean) shows some boys busy in the laundry, where they are said to be very efficient (as also in the darning of stockings), and another the tailors' shop. Mr. Dean, who, as a member of the Walsall Board, has been in close touch with the work of the school, speaks highly of the spirit which pervades it and of happy results in the after lives of the boys.

THE REGISTRAR-GENERAL'S REPORT.

WE are indebted to a correspondent for the following notes:—

The report of the Registrar-General of England and Wales, for the year 1899, has just been issued, and contains as usual much of interest.

The number of marriages registered during the year was 262,334, being the greatest number on record, and showing a greater proportional increase than the estimated population, so that the year must have been unusally prosperous. This is remarkable, inasmuch as the Boer war broke out in the last quarter, and we notice that the marriage rate in that quarter was slightly less than in 1898, while the second and third quarters showed a considerable excess. The Marriage Act of 1898 came into operation on April 1, 1899, and we find that the trustees of 1,262 chapels appointed an authorised person to act as a registrar of marriages. This is about one-tenth of the total number of registered buildings. The Roman Catholics appear to have resolved not to avail themselves of this privilege; while the Wesleyan Methodists have adopted it most eagerly, no less than 611 out of the 1,262 chapels being of their denomination. The actual number of marriages registered by authorised persons was 2,912, being an average of 2·3 for each authorised person. The average age at marriage shows a trifling increase, as has been the case for some time past. The number of illiterates, who made their mark instead of signing their names, has fallen to 29 men and 34 women in 1,000 marriages, and a good proportion of these are illiterate foreigners who come to London and are married in the East-end. Thirty years ago the number of illiterates was 185 men and 251 women per 1,000 marriages, and the number was much greater at a still earlier date.

Out of the 262,334 marriages 177,896, or 678 per 1,000, were Church of England marriages. This is the greatest number ever recorded, but the percentage is the smallest. The percentage had constantly dropped from 857 per 1,000 in 1850 to 698 in 1892; it then fell 6 in 1893, and 6 in 1894, after which it remained steady until 1899, when it fell to 678. The Marriage Act of 1898 may account for part of this sudden decline, but other causes must have been at work also.

The number of Roman Catholic marriages was 10,686, and the percentage 41 per 1,000. This is the greatest number ever recorded, and an increase of 1 per 1,000 upon 1898; but the percentage has only been as low as 40 per 1,000 on five occasions, and as low as 41 on eight previous occasions, three of which were the years 1895, 1896, and 1897. The variations in the number of Roman Catholic marriages appear to depend very much on the prosperity of Lancashire and some other districts in the North, where Roman Catholics are most numerous.

The number of Protestant Nonconformist marriages in 1899 was 32,603, and the percentage 124 per 1,000. This is the greatest number, and the highest percentage ever recorded, being an increase of 3 per 1,000 in 1898, up to which time there had been a continuous increase since the early days of registration forty years ago. Out of this number of 124, 113 per 1,000 were celebrated before a registrar, and 11 by an authorised person under the Act of 1898.

The Jewish marriages numbered 1,666, and amounted to 6·4 per 1,000 marriages. This is the greatest number ever recorded and the highest percentage. Jewish marriages have steadily increased from 113, with a percentage of 1·7 per 1,000 in 1850 to the present number.

The number of civil marriages in 1899 was 39,403, and the percentage 150 per 1,000. These are both the highest on record, the increase having been continuous from 1850 to the present time.

With respect to births, 928,646 were recorded in 1899. This was the greatest number on record, but it gave the lowest percentage—namely, 29·3 to 1,000 persons living. The deaths recorded in 1899 were 581,799, giving a percentage of 18·3 to 1,000 persons. This is higher than it has been for the last three years, and we have also to remember that many of our troops went out to South Africa before the end of the year, and the deaths which there took place do not figure in our list. We are surprised indeed to find in this report no allusion to the war in South Africa. It is true that there is a paragraph of seven lines in the report, and a Table, No. 34, which has one line relating to the mortality in the Army in 1899. But we are convinced that neither of these include the casualties in the Boer war. Possibly the military year ends with the autumn, and the deaths caused by the war will figure in the next return.

THE nineteenth Triennial Conference of the Liberation Society was held on Tuesday and Wednesday, Mr. Carvell Williams, one of the original members of the Society, presiding at the first session, and Mr. J. E. Ellis, M.P., on Wednesday. Resolutions were passed against the proposal of a Catholic University for Ireland, and on the subject of sectarian education in this country. The demand for greater autonomy within the Church was welcomed, but a resolution, proposed by Mr. G. H. Morgan, and seconded by Mr. T. Grosvenor Lee, declared that such autonomy must involve disestablishment.

THE annual meeting of the National Anti-vivisection Society is to be held in St. James's Hall, on Thursday evening, May 9, when Lord Llangattock will take the chair for the first time as President. Archdeacon Wilberforce, Colonel Lockwood, M.P., Mr. G. W. E. Russell, and the Hon. Stephen Coleridge are announced as speakers to take part in the meeting.

WE are glad to hear that the Rev. Dr Griffiths, recently minister at Pontypridd, has accepted the invitation of the North Midland Presbyterian and Unitarian Association to become their District Missionary. Dr. Griffiths is to reside at Ilkeston with special charge of the congregation there, and the new movement at Burton. He will also organise the lay-preaching work of the district.

THE Annual Assembly of the Western Union of Unitarian and Free Christian Churches was held at Bridgwater on Thursday, under the presidency of the Rev. H. S. Solly, M.A., the preacher being the Rev. J. Collins Odgers, M.A., of Bury. Our report of the meeting will appear next week.

THE HUMAN GOD.

GOD created man in His own image, says the creation story in our Bible; and the statement undoubtedly implies in some sense the human likeness of God. Indeed, it may be questioned whether man ever has relinquished the human image to aid his conception of Deity. Since first he began to see in himself something more divine than in any animal and without which even the life-giving sun could not be deified, it would seem natural to find the progress of religion in the selection of higher and higher aspects of humanity as being the essential characteristics of God; but the very fact that they were higher must always still necessitate that they should be human.

And yet in an earlier Hebrew scripture than the above any attempt to conceive God upon human lines—nay, any attempt, perhaps, to conceive Him at all—is denounced with the noblest eloquence and poetry. The second Isaiah pours scorn upon the wood and metal images of his contemporaries, not only for their materialism, but most notably because they were fashioned "after the figure of a man, according to the beauty of a man," which to the average Jew (if not to the average Christian) was doubtless, so far as it went, a redeeming feature. Moreover, this prophet makes it clear that he does not refer only to the outward likeness of man. We must not even conceive God's mind after the likeness of the mind of man, "for my thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways, saith the Lord."

In fact God transcends all comparison, or likeness, and resembles no material or created thing. The charge of atheism so consistently brought against the Jews because they had no visible deity is thus sublimely turned against their accusers, whose material deities are rightly declared to be "nothing" and "vanity," just because they are mere objects of sensual cognition like the trees and rocks from which they are fashioned.

Isaiah, then, tolerates no image of and no comparison with Deity. For any kind of representation, even a verbal description, can never be more than the poor symbol of such a conscious reality as the power and presence of God. The idolater needs some visible expression for Deity, for the very reason that he has never beheld Him face to face; but the true prophet finds all possible presentations mere vexatious detractions from the mightily present reality he knows and lives in.

This, and this only, may we say of God's proper being — that He dwelleth in "Eternity," "with him also that is of a humble and contrite spirit" (Is. lvii. 15). God is transcendent and utterly beyond man's conception, but yet in the heart may His very being be felt as an indwelling presence to uplift and revive.

But too well do we most of us know by experience that the prophet may live and breathe upon heights which yield no sustenance for weaker spirits. This sublime faith is sufficient so long as the light of God-consciousness burns bright within us; but the difficulty comes when we seek to renew our spiritual life and to relight communion with Diety. In times of bodily weariness, in hours of disappointment and sorrow, in temptation, in all times when most of all we need to feel the sustaining presence of God—how often do we find our very need leaves us too weak to uplift ourselves into communion with the Infinite and Eternal.

Out of some such spiritual deadlock as this it was, that the soul found itself a road in the great teaching of the Incarnation. God, it was held, had shown Himself not only to the humble and contrite yet heroic souls of mighty prophets, but for the sake of us weaklings who see only with the bodily eye and fear to trust our flickering visions of higher things, He had uttered His complete purpose, His "word," His Will towards mankind, nay, His very being, so far as we are concerned, in the person of a man. Henceforth, however insoluble the mystery of the absolute source of creation might be, there could be no doubt as to its intention towards ourselves; for had we not had its living, tangible utterance in our midst? And, behold, it was very good.

Now whether we recognise them as mediating vehicles to God or not, we all of us find the objects of our primal and most natural love and devotion in things apparent to sense, and most unfailingly in some human manifestation. And the greatness of this doctrine is not so much that it saves us from the necessity of the arrogant attempt to conceive the Infinite with our finite faculties as this—that it makes a natural impulse to love a natural object into the medium of communion with Infinity. It concedes full recognition, nay, welcomes with joy man's demand for a cognisable and a concrete and veritably human object of adoration, but does not allow devotion to rest in the mere earthly manifestation till it has made it the channel to what transcends all thought. This it does with persistent faithfulness, ever leading men's minds to dwell upon the highest features of humanity as embodied in the ideal Christ, and yet imposing no limitation, even human, upon the perfection of the absolute Godhead still transcending His creation in "infinite excess." What we have—as it teaches—in Christ is His "Word made flesh," and this gives a satisfying and exhaustive knowledge of God in His relation to ourselves. The fourth evangelist finds in Christ the revelation of God as love, a man in whose person the simplest nature can find an object, not only to love with unreserved sincerity, but the greatness of whose love for him was manifested by the supreme surrender of life itself.

It is impossible to over-estimate the importance of this doctrine's having selected an actual man as its mediator with Infinity. Jesus was not a fiction of the hand or brain, like the images or prophetic conceptions. He was a creation not of man's but of God's, and so immediately revealed his Almighty original. And the weakness of the dogma is not that it sets too high a value upon the mediation of a single soul—Tennyson has popularised the idea that one floweret might teach us "what God and man is"—but that this soul necessarily became the goal and not the channel as soon as his mediation was deemed exclusive. For if we can only reach God through Christ, then for us Christ is God, and not a mediator to Him. That is to say our worship does and must, after all, rest in Christ, and he does not lead us to aught beyond himself, as a true revealer must.

Or, again, any revealer must reveal either the ultimate in which all creation finds its unity, or else some further multiplicity. If Christ reveals a God of whom nothing else shows any sign, then the apparent wildering multiplicity of this universe is only confirmed and increased; whereas if he in truth reveals the one sole Deity ulterior to all phenomenal creation, then all else must in its degree reveal Him too. If we find meaning in the life of Christ not put there by ourselves, but disturbing our souls with its appeal; if he is to us the spoken utterance of will or love else unknown—can we believe that that same will is utterly withdrawn from all phenomena but this one, and that creation apart from him is meaningless, barren, dumb. Indeed, it is impossible. There is no other alternative, but either Christ is our God, and leads to naught beyond himself, or he is but one part—supreme, it may be, but only a part—of the universal mediating power of creation between the soul of man and the uncreated will.

Which is it? For if the visible human Christ is our Deity, this is the very essence of idolatry. Idolatry consists in worship or joy in the visible for itself, and not as revealing its invisible original. A worshipper of wood and stone is not necessarily an idolatrous worshipper if his images are to him significant of ideals, or the mere machinery of communion between his finite soul and the besetting necessities of life's ultimate Will. On the other hand, a man who worships Christ, or any other divine effulgence, as God's exclusive revelation is necessarily an idolater, inasmuch as he cannot choose but worship the revelation, not the Revealer—the creature, not the universal, and therefore universally revealed, Creator.

What, then, shall we look for in a worship which has fallen from the adoration of an utterance of God's for its power to reveal Himself, till it has become an idolatry of the creature for its own sake? We shall surely look for some human tampering with the outward features of God's work, and we shall as surely find it. For when man has mentally perverted a natural object into an "abomination," he cannot then hold off his hands, but he must disfigure it to his own liking. And for two milleniums Christians have been busy in fashioning to their will the life of their Christ. As Isaiah says that the idol worshippers "mark out" their gods "with pencil and compasses," so has the historical Jesus become only the raw material out of which a Christ-god has been fashioned. The tree which sprang from God's wild earth and grew in native majesty and grace was hewn down by man's hand, and when a part thereof had been thrown into the fire, with the "residue" thereof did men create a god!

But how have the many Unitarians and others fared who have completely rejected the incarnation or mediatory theory of Christ's nature? Returning—ideally at all events—to something like Isaiah's conception of a Deity inhabiting eternity, and no less truly the humble and contrite spirit, we have become conspicuous, we are told, on the one hand for the loftiest spirituality, and on the other for the deadliest lack of it. For however chosen souls might rejoice in the unintermittent or oft-recurring fulness of God's immediate light as it flames within, the natural man has ever been unable to reach the heaven of heavens at a single stride, and has presently relaxed his endeavours to kindle the flame at all.

But there exists a third type among us (and possibly the commonest) of those who are—all unconsciously—sincere conformists to the orthodox system of mediation. Centuries of Christ-worship could not be without their effect upon us, and for many of us the place left vacant by the Divine man has been filled by a human God. That this is so is witnessed by this fact amongst many others—that it has been found possible to worship our Deity with the old hymns (and even prayers), merely substituting the word "God" or "Father" for the original "Jesus" or "Christ."

In fact so inevitable is some system of mediation, that for want of the orthodox human mediator we have been obliged to premise a fictitious Being, incorporeal, but otherwise as nearly like the Christ-god as might be. To many of us God is a part of creation—acting, as we do, in the present only, and unto whom Abraham and Isaac are, so far as their actual lives on earth are concerned, as much dead as they are to us—aye, and Jesus too, quite dead, howsoever we may protest. Our Deity is after all a man, with fewer and vaguer categories it is true, but necessarily with some to save His reality! Who, then, are our real allies—Isaiah or the idolaters?

Nowhere is the futility of categorising God more evident than in current attempts to solve the insoluble mystery of evil. Isaiah rejecting all categories logically and unflinchingly ascribes to Yahweh the utterance "I make peace and I create evil" (Isaiah xlv. 7). But in attempting to compass the idea of God's being and form in our finite minds a conception of His nature we find ourselves obliged to rule out from our thoughts of Him responsibility for so much that is horrible and even fiendish in life. We are, then, obliged to resort in some form to the plea that our Deity could not create good without creating evil at the same time. I will not stay to discuss how much evil it was absolutely necessary to create in order to ensure a reasonable amount of good, and how far the ideal balance has been successfully secured; for it is obvious that in whatever degree we throw the responsibility upon "essential conditions" or the "nature of things" we are to that extent making our God subject like ourselves to the conditions of this universe, so that He is dependent upon it and not it upon Him, and the Ultimate is not Will and not personal. But surely such solutions which leave the problem after all unsolved do but lead our minds away from the direction where truth lies and are far worse than acknowledged ignorance. They are kindred with the ancient solution of universal gravitation; the world stood upon an elephant, the elephant upon a tortoise—but whereon the tortoise stood it is safest not to inquire.

It is true that we are obliged to use words to refer to our experiences of God's life in our souls and in the world; and if we have experienced the support of a strength not our own in weakness or affliction, what more right than that we should describe this as the love or the mercy of God. There is no harm, indeed, if we deduce nothing from it, in our actually picturing God as with hands and feet—for we do not believe these are actually to be found anywhere in space—they are but mental symbols or media for our minds. But a Being who can be in any strict sense described by our finite categories even, for instance, as "good" is at best only a mediator between our finitude and the Infinitude of God.

Are we, then, left to choose between the orthodox Christ and a Deity beyond description, imagination, or knowledge? If so, there is surely little wonder in the fact that a silent agnosticism has spread its spirit far and wide through the religious life of Protestantdom. And, indeed, one cannot tell but what this might have been the choice had not a wonderful thing happened in this age. For to-day Science and Poetry have joined hands as never before to reveal the truth that God's "incarnate thought" is no idealisation of one man's life but Creation itself. The actual Nazarene prophet may indeed be to us a shining summit of God's created glory, but there is to be found no discontinuity between any great soul and the whole universe. Science has taught us to see the universe as one continuous procession, one mighty evolution; she has bound for us the leaves of Creation into a single book, and it is this book which poetic vision (I can call it by no other name) has taught us to read. For to him who has once seen in the facts of this life the revelation of Divine Thought, it is as impossible to ignore their divinity as it is for the man who has learnt to read to see nothing in a book but an aggregation of paper pulp and printer's ink (which without question is what a book is).

This is the modern doctrine of the incarnation—or to use the modern expression the "evolution"—of the Divine Mind within the circumscription of the universe. Its scribes are our Darwins and Huxleys, and its prophets our Whitmans and Wordsworths. For Wordsworth is the type of modern mystic. Setting his life aside for the purpose of reflecting the undisturbed vision of the Deity, he is farthest of all men from the effort to loose himself from the bondage of earth. His life was a full feast of sensation. But his truest joy never rested in the sights or sounds which awaked it; it was ever intent to fathom the content with which they were charged for his soul. The nearest approach to a feeling of remorse which he records of himself is for a period of life when he was—

Bent overmuch on superficial things,
Pampering myself with meagre novelties
Of colour and proportion; to the moods
Of time and season, to the moral power,
The affections and the spirit of the place
*Insensible, . . . .
I speak in recollection of a time
When the bodily eye, in every stage of life
The most despotic of our senses, gained
Such strength in me † as often held my mind
In absolute dominion. . . . .
I roamed from hill to hill, from rock to rock,
Still craving combinations of new forms,
New pleasure, wider empire for the sight,
Proud of her own endowments, and rejoiced
To lay the inner faculties asleep.
—(Prelude xii.).

Even in the love of Nature herself, Wordsworth found the danger of what I have called idolatry, and this was corrected only when he found himself able after this single period of infidelity once more to rejoice in Man, and by broadening his field of revelation, to deepen the revealing power of all.

I found
Once more in Man an object of delight,
Of pure imagination, and of love;
And, as the horizon of my mind enlarged,
Again I took the intellectual eye
For my instructor, studious more to see
Great Truths, than touch and handle little ones.*—(Prelude xiii.).

And now the poet reaches the summit of his thought. Man, indeed, may be worshipped idolatrously—but not by him. Wordsworth's early and enduring devotion to pure Nature (the anchor of my purest thoughts, the nurse, the guide, the guardian of my heart†) has so attuned his mind to true worship of God behind the "empire" of the "sight" that he entered the sanctuary of Man without peril. Confidently shouldering past all limited and personal presentments of Deity, which hardly fail to dim our vision of man himself as the seat of God's supreme human revelation, he writes:—

Jehovah—with his thunder, and the choir
Of shouting Angels, and the emphyreal thrones—
I pass them unalarmed, and then continues to speak in awed tones of the Mind of Man,

My haunt and the main region of my song,

or rapturously of

. . . the discerning intellect of Man
When wedded to this goodly universe
In love and holy passion.—("Recluse," and quoted in Preface to "Excursion.")

And it is his vision of humanity which taught Wordsworth as he says:—

To look on Nature not as in the hour
Of thoughtless youth. . . . .
I have felt
A presence that disturbs me with the joy
Of elevated thoughts; a sense sublime
Of something far more deeply interfused,
Whose dwelling is the light of setting suns,
And the round ocean and the living air,
And the blue sky, and in the mind of man;
A motion and a spirit, that impels
All thinking things, all objects of all thought,
And rolls through all things. Therefore am I still
A lover of the meadows and the woods,
And mountains;* and of all that we behold
From this green earth; of all the mighty world
Of eye and ear.—("Tintern Abbey")

For when once we have learnt how rapidly all joy which rests upon the things of sense and knowledge themselves fades and disappears, and that the only lasting joy is to be found even in man is in his eternal and therefore divine significance, then this "green earth" and all the details of earthly life become to us of priceless worth as being our only media to God. For the universe expresses God not as an arbitrary symbol expresses, but each part is essentially wedded to some Divine thought and is its true incarnation. No day can ever recur, no friend can ever return or be replaced in this world, and if we have not grasped what God meant by them our lives are for all time the less God-lit.

If, then, we would know God as human, there, indeed, is a vision of His humanity, but the condition of our seeing it is that we learn to see man as divine. It is when human relations (all, both most sacred and most commonplace)—the voice, the touch, the communion of thought and emotion—shine with some light of eternal joy that we are verily seeing and feeling God as He moves in living flesh. In the light of this truth we may, out of our very gloom and weakness, escape into God's tenderest sympathy in the peace of Nature or the presence of a friend. And if a book be our solace and inspiration or the memory of lived lives, then never indeed was there —is there—a purer word of Deity than in the Nazarene Jesus. Never did God's universal Will become more explicit. But who is he that shall boast that to him God's thought is revealed in Christ (whom he hath not seen), when at the same time he is blind to the infinite word of God in his brother (whom he hath seen)? Never, indeed, was the supreme human revelation of God more truly expressed than in the words, "I and my Father are one"; but this truth is only to be fathomed by us when we too, like Jesus, have known moments in which self-consciousness has become God-consciousness, and self-will has reached its consummation in the Will of God. JOSEPH H. WICKSTEED.

LITERATURE.

THE ENCYCLOPÆDIA BIBLICA.*

IT is impossible within the limits of a review to give anything like an adequate account of the matter contained in the second volume of this monumental work. Indeed, any real and searching criticism of it is impossible for two reasons. First, it would occupy space which would far exceed the limits of an article, or even a series of articles; and secondly, no one man, however learned or industrious, would be competent for such a task. The volume before us contains 1,544 columns; a large part of these are in small print, and they bristle throughout with references and abbreviations: they abound in conjectural emendations of the Hebrew text; they deal with cuneiform and hieroglyphic inscriptions; they discuss the history of ancient empires and of the smaller Oriental kingdoms; they exhibit the most recent results of archæological investigation; they enter into all the minutiæ of Biblical criticism, and they are concerned with the vital interests of religion, for this volume contains long and elaborate articles on Eschatology, on the Synoptic Gospels, on St. John, and the writings attributed to St. John, besides a treatise, shorter and more meagre than due proportion seems to require, entitled "Jesus." Plainly, no man can presume to form a judgment on such a variety of topics. We can only call attention to one or two prominent features in the volume.

We may begin by a remark which is, perhaps, necessary, considering the stress which we have laid on the minute and varied learning of the book. We believe that any reader of ordinary intelligence will peruse the longer articles with absorbing interest. Few things can be more delightful than to meet with a complete history of Egypt written in agreeable style, and stating clearly everything of first-rate moment that has been discovered down to the present day. Again, Guthe's article on Israel is better than anything we know hitherto accessible in our own language. The editor's article on the Hittites is perfect in its fulness, lucidity, and cautious reserve. Nor is any praise too high for the geographical articles on Ephraim, Jerusalem, Judah, &c., and the value of these is greatly enhanced by the beautiful maps, of which this volume has no fewer than nineteen.

Among the articles which deal with the New Testament, the chief interest belongs to the elaborate essay on the "Gospels," which is supplemented by another on the gospel and epistle of St, John. It ought, we think, to be carefully remembered that these essays maintain the most extreme positions held by the sceptical critics, and by no means represent the general opinion of well-informed scholars, either at home or abroad. Sometimes, as it seems to the present writer, it is to prejudice rather than to sober estimate of the evidence that the conclusions are due. Surely this is not too much to say of the confident statement that Justin "either did not know John or, which is more probable, knew it, but regarded it with suspicion." Some of the shorter articles breathe the same spirit. We are, for example, quite unable to accept the high-handed method which sweeps away the whole story of Judas Iscariot. The criticism displays, as we venture to think, the oddest mixture of scepticism with fancifulness and credulity. At the same time we gladly acknowledge that in the articles with which we disagree most, we find a careful and accurate collection of facts, which possesses very high value, whatever we may think of the inferences drawn from them, however much we may regret that so little mention is made of facts which tell the other way. Moreover, we sincerely rejoice that the extremest views of the negative critics have at last been put before the English public with the utmost fulness, and with undoubted learning and ability. Those who desire to form a real judgment should read along with the article on the Gospels in this volume the corresponding article by Dr. Stanton, as well as that on Jesus Christ, by Canon Sanday, in Hastings' Bible Dictionary. The truth, on whichever side it may be, can never suffer from honest investigation. For our own part we are content to end with the noble words of an early Christian writer:—"Let no such opinion ever prevail in Christ's church, that falsehood contributes to the praise and glory of Christ."

SHORT NOTICES.

THE volume in the Eras of the Christian Church series on the "Reformation" (Edinburgh: T. and T. Clark, 8vo, pp. vii.-488) is from the pen of Mr. Williston Walker. It appears to be a conscientious attempt to present to the general reader the leading features of the Reformation movement on the Continent. The "Anglican Reformation" has not been included, as it is reserved for separate treatment in another volume. In literary style and interest it does not rise above the ordinary level of a text-book, but for a text-book it has one fatal disqualification. It contains no references to the original authorities. This is only pardonable in the case of an historian of established reputation writing for a very popular audience. It cannot be pleaded that the plan of the series does not admit of references, as the companion volume by Mr. Vernon Bartlet on the Apostolic Age, while it is by no means as full in this respect as we could wish, contains many notes which show that he is dealing directly with the original sources.

In very marked contrast to the somewhat American style of Mr. Walker's historical writing is the extraordinary minuteness and the almost baffling array of authorities in the third volume of Möller's History of the Christian Church ("History of the Christian Church," by the late Dr. Wilhelm Möller, Vol. III., edited by Dr. G. Kaweran, and translated from the German by J. H. Freese, M.A. London: Swan Sonnenschein and Co., 1900., 8vo, pp. xi.-476. 15s.) It is written, as we should expect, chiefly from the Lutheran point of view, and the treatment of the English Reformation, on account of its peculiar features and intrinsic importance, is far too short. But for a broad and scholarly survey over the continental movement, alike in its religious and political aspects, we know of no book in English which is likely to prove so useful to the student. Its bibliography alone makes it invaluable.

W. H. D.

Among the stories recently sent for review two are worthy of mention. Saronia (by Richard Short, published by Elliot Stock) shows evidence of a good deal of study of the ancient cult at the Temple of "Diana of the Ephesians." It is written by an artist and abounds in word-pictures; indeed, the abundance is somewhat fatiguing. We need not outline the plot; enough to say it is worked out with no lack of the marvellous. An interesting subject is introduced in the sketch of Christian activity in the ancient capital; but the author seems more at home in recalling the atmosphere of Greek art and Roman luxury. In Nella: the Heart of the Army, we have a very different book, and one in which the purpose is singularly practical. The author, Mr. Philip Verills Mighels, evidently sees that the great "servant question" is not to be solved by any simple and easy expedients. His dream is that of a movement which should do for working girls what the volunteer movement and the regular army do for young men—drilling them into smartness and efficiency by a discipline which is all too clearly lacking in the haphazard ways open to girls at present. We understand that he has introduced his scheme of an "army" for servant girls and others of the class to experts in social reform, and that it has been discussed as a practical measure. The reader of Mr. Mighels's story will see that he has gone into the matter thoroughly. His pages bear witness to an intimate study of the actualities of the modern London household, especially of the humbler class; and the picture revealed is deplorable. If his suggestions should lead to anything like the organisation of a smart corps of servant girls—fit even to supply a detachment to walk in the Lord Mayor's show, such is the author's enthusiasm!—he must be counted among the worthy pioneers of a better time coming. The story-reader, perhaps, will welcome an assurance that although so distinctly a "story with a purpose," the book is as brimful of romance as any six-shilling volume of the day. It is published by John Macqueen.

Correspondents are requested to note that to be sure of insertion the same week, news must reach the Office by the first post on Thursday at latest, and the earlier in the week the better.

OBITUARY.

HENRY WARREN MEADE-KING.

ON Monday, April 22, 1901, after private cremation, the funeral took place of Mr. H. W. Meade-King, the service being beautifully and impressively conducted by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong.

The Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, always so quaint and picturesque, and looking still more so of late years owing to the close proximity of very modern buildings, was filled to overflowing with a congregation of very varied religious belief and political opinion, testifying to the eclectic nature of the influence wielded by Mr. Meade-King for so many years in Liverpool. The reason of that influence rested entirely upon his own high character, and wide and generous sympathies. A native of Taunton, and coming to Liverpool comparatively unknown, he had impressed the business community of that city with a strong sense of his clear-sighted capacity for affairs. He was, however, identified with no great commercial undertaking, and no very prominent or startling political movement suggested his name or explained his reputation. He retired from business as a merchant so long ago as 1869, and since then his only connection with the commercial life of the great city was his directorship of the National Bank of Liverpool, and afterwards of Parr's Banking Company, which had absorbed the earlier bank.

The secret of his career must be looked for in the philanthropic activities and sympathies into which he threw himself in an unobtrusive but intensely earnest spirit throughout the long period of his residence in the near neighbourhood of his adopted city. Only a brief allusion is possible here to the chief of these. His religious sympathies were no doubt to some extent formed for him by his father, Mr. Richard Meade-King, a well-known lawyer of Taunton, who declined to accept an official position rather than sign the Thirty-nine Articles, a perusal of which led to his leaving the Church of England and becoming an Unitarian. The same conscientious attachment to liberty of thought, and loyalty to conviction were eminently characteristic of his son. He was an earnest Liberal all his life, taking an active part in the Liberal organisations of Liverpool, and acting for many years as chairman of the Liberal Association for the Bootle division of Lancashire. He was always in the advanced section of that party; through all recent divisions his judgment kept pace with advanced Radical and Progressive thought. At the same time the range of his sympathies was kept well in hand by a clear common-sense view of what was the best practical course to pursue. It was not often he found reason to change an opinion once deliberately formed.

Mr. Meade-King was an active member of the Anti-Corn Law League. He was the founder of the Liverpool Public Footpaths Association, which nearly forty years ago did great service in preserving many rights of way then in danger. He was the principal promoter, and for some time the chairman of the National Fund to defray the expenses of the defence of Parnell and his friends in their political trial. The Liverpool dispensaries, which have been such a boon to the poorer section of the population, he was much nterested in, and was president of this charity for many years. He was a member of the Committee of old Paradise-street Chapel so far back as 1845 and an original trustee and many times chairman of Hope-street Church. The Higher Grade Schools connected with Hope-street Church owed a great measure of their success to his exertions and interest. He was also identified with many of the societies connected with the Unitarian community in Liverpool, particularly the Domestic Missions.

Mr. Meade-King married a daughter of Mr. Joseph Higgin, of Manchester, and their home will always be a pleasant memory to their friends as of a bright and cultured social centre. A feature of his wide sympathies may be found in the warm welcome always given there to visitors from other countries, whether those under British rule or not. Mr. Meade-King made many friends in Holland, and in North and South America in his earlier years; and a traveller who brought an introduction to him was sure to be made to feel at home. The writer has very pleasant memories of having met there on more than one occasion Mr. P. C. Mozoomdar, of Calcutta.

Mr. Meade-King was a magistrate for Lancashire and for Liverpool. Until increasing deafness prevented him he attended to the duties of those offices with earnest assiduity, his high principle, clear sound judgment and keen sense of justice making his services of special value.

On Sunday morning a memorial sermon was preached by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong in Hope-street Church.

MISS ROWLAND.

WITH the death of Miss Mary Rowland, at Cranleigh, on Wednesday, April 24, at the ripe old age of ninety-six years, another "link among the days" disappears from our ken. She retained her interest in her younger friends as her older ones slipped from her side; indeed, it seemed like having a glimpse into another world to converse with one to whom our fathers seemed as young men; and we who had long grown accustomed to the responsibilities of middle life were almost as children. Never pessimistic, she yet regarded some modern developments with disfavour: railways, she thought, had a tendency to separate families; ladies on bicycles were an anachronism; yet it was remarkable how well she kept in touch with current topics and interests. Her younger life was passed at Ditchling, and there, under the ministry of the Rev. Abraham Bennett, her earliest religious impressions were received; she was one of the last members publicly baptised in the chapel, the rite being performed in 1828; she was probably the last survivor of those who remember Aunt Molly Brown, and the group of friends who surrounded her.

How keen and lively Miss Rowland's recollection was of these younger days could be seen so lately as last winter, when, hearing that a history of the neighbourhood was being written, she inquired if it would be long before it came out, with that touch of anxiety felt by those who are conscious that their time grows short. Her middle life was spent at Cranleigh as housekeeper to her brother; but for many years now she has resided in Horsham, whither she removed mainly that she might be near the Worthing-road Chapel. Here she took an active part in Sunday-school work, and for some years served on the chapel committee, with growing infirmities caused her retirement. A cheery eventide, with little acute pain, was passed in company with her sister, and, later, with a devoted friend.

Only three weeks before her death she was moved to the residence of her nephew, Mr. Stephen Rowland, and seemed actually to enjoy the fourteen miles' ride thither, settling comfortably into her new abode. The funeral service on Saturday was conducted by the Rev. J. J. Marten, and on Sunday, after an allusion to Miss Rowland's death, the following appropriate hymn was sung by the congregation:—

How blest is he whose tranquil mind,
When life declines, recalls again
The years that time has cast behind,
And reaps delight from toil and pain.

So when the transient storm is past,
The sudden gloom, and driving shower,
The sweetest sunshine is the last,
The loveliest is the evening hour.

THE REV. JOHN NEWENHAM HOARE, M.A.

THE present writer records with great regret the sudden death of his old friend Mr. Newenham Hoare, vicar of St. John's, Keswick. Mr. Hoare was leaving his parsonage on Sunday morning last to celebrate Holy Communion, when he was seized with heart spasm and died the same evening in the sixty-fourth year of his age. Our friend was a man of considerable mark, a staunch Liberal Churchman of the Dean Stanley and Jowett school, well versed in the higher Biblical criticism, a contributor to the Edinburgh Review, and a Civil Service Examiner. For several years, from about 1875 to 1885, he was a frequent contributor to THE INQUIRER, and some of its older readers may recall his well-known initials "J. N. H." appended to scholarly reviews of successive volumes of the Hibbert Lectures, and other works chiefly relating to Comparative Religion. A nephew of the late Dean of Waterford, and a distinguished scholar of Trinity College, Dublin, Mr. Newenham Hoare began his clerical career as vicar of a parish near Dublin, but when the Irish Church was disestablished he accepted Commutation, and preferred a curacy at St. Luke's, Chelsea, to a living in the Disestablished Church. A strong advocate of an Established Church, he nevertheless wished it to be thoroughly nationalised so as to be open to "all who profess and call themselves Christians." From the curacy of St. Luke's, Chelsea, Mr. Hoare was preferred in 1884 to the important living of St. John's, Keswick, where he cultivated the most friendly relations with some of our Unitarian friends residing in the Lake District. Of late years Mr. Hoare was more closely connected with the High Church party as regards ceremonial, but we have reason to believe that he never wavered in his sympathies with Broad Church religion.

T. L. M.

MR. JOSEPH GUPPY.

ON April 20 this greatly respected citizen of Swansea, and the oldest member of the Unitarian Church, High-street, passed away at the age of eighty-seven. Born at Shepton Mallet, he was apprenticed to the trade of a currier, and in the pursuit of his craft visited Taunton, Bristol, London, Manchester, and Glasgow, before finally settling in Swansea, which he did about the year 1835. In 1864 he started in business for himself. Benevolent towards all organisations for doing good, he shrank from the turmoil of public life, and his chief official duties were those of hon. treasurer of the Unitarian Church, which he joined in 1842, under the ministry of the Rev. G. B. Brock. A public discussion, it may still be remembered by some, had taken place between Mr. Brock and the vicar of the town; and the presentation of Unitarianism clearly convinced his thoughtful and devout mind. Up to the last Mr. Guppy maintained a keen interest in the affairs of the church, and generously supported it.

The funeral took place on Tuesday week, being conducted by the Rev. W. Tudor Jones, who on Sunday last preached a memorial sermon, in which he said:—"Mr. Guppy's view of religion was a sane one. You could hardly come across a man who laid so little emphasis on dogmatic theology. As far as I could gather, he was never caught in the net of creeds and formulas. Sufficient for him was the one thought, 'God is good.' In that atmosphere he lived, and one of his last words to me a few hours before he died was: 'Oh, God is good; He is very good.' 'Are you in pain?' 'No, no, in no pain at all; God is so good!' So it was with him in life; so it was with him in death. . . . He died as he had lived—full of courage, full of hope and faith that death is not the end, but the beginning of life."

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

GEOFFREY sat over the fire with his father on a Sunday evening. They liked that time together, and often had long quiet talks.

"That was a beautiful anthem that we had at church to-day, wasn't it?" said his father.

"Yes, very," said Geoffrey, who was very fond of music. After a little silence Geoffrey said, "But I don't think I understand the words, father."

"Why not, Geoffrey? I thought they were very simple."

"Well, it said 'Seek ye the Lord while He may be found, call ye upon Him while He is near.' I thought God was always near, and that we could always find Him."

"God is always near, Geoffrey; but I am afraid we can't always find Him."

Geoffrey glanced up at his father, wonderingly; "Why?" said he.

"There are other words that follow those, my boy; do you remember what they are?"

"I don't think I do, father; what are they?"

"The next verse says 'Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts; and let him return unto the Lord, and He will have mercy upon him; and to our God, for He will abundantly pardon.' Don't you remember them now?"

"Yes I do, father."

"Well, I think that verse gives the answer to your question. Think about it."

Geoffrey was silent a long time. Then his father said, "Blessed are the pure in heart; for they shall see God."

"And if people are wicked they can't see God, then?" said Geoffrey.

"Yes, that is how it is."

"Then it isn't true that God can always be found?"

"God is always there, my boy; He is never away."

"Then can't He always be found? And the words say, 'Call on Him while He is near,' as if He did go away."

"No, He never goes away; there is no reason like that for our not finding Him. If you shut the shutters of a room into which the sun is streaming, what happens?"

"Why it is dark, of course."

"Yes, and you can't see the sun; but that is not because the sun is gone away; and if you want to find the sun again you must open the shutters."

Geoffrey looked quickly up at his father, and said, "I see now: then it is our own doing when we can't find God."

"That's just how it is," said his father; "when we go our own ways and don't care whether we do right or wrong, or if we like the wrong the best, we have shut the shutters; and it is useless, then, to complain that we can't find God. We have made it dark for ourselves by our own act; but the sun is there just the same, and we have only to open the shutters. We are often wonderfully clever at blinding ourselves. But we cannot hide ourselves away, by making our own hearts dark. God knows all about us; and the moment we forsake our wicked ways or our unrighteous thoughts we understand how merciful God is and how abundantly He pardons."

"Then even if we think God is not near, He is near, is He?"

"Yes, closer than we can understand."

"Then I don't understand why it says "Call ye upon Him while He is near."

"Because there is another way of being far away. God is good, and wishes us to be good. It is only goodness and purity that can see goodness and purity, and if we do wickedness, ever so little, or think 'unrighteous thoughts' they come like a thick veil between us and God; the thoughts of our minds and the intentions of our hearts are not pure, and we have taken ourselves away from God, and then it is the same to us as if He were not 'near' to us, for we are not near in spirit to Him. You remember the beautiful story of the prodigal son? He took himself off away from his father, and lived wickedly, and had much to suffer in consequence; but he forsook his wicked ways, and returned, and then found his father waiting for him with love and pardon, ready, as soon as he said 'Father, I have sinned against heaven and in thy sight,' and was willing to be humbled."

"Yes," said Geoffrey, "that is like what the anthem said: he had mercy upon him; and abundantly pardoned."

"Those words are two verses of the fifty-fifth chapter of Isaiah; it is a very beautiful chapter; you had better read it to yourself. Another verse says, 'Incline your ear, and come unto me; hear, and your soul shall live.' You see, Geoffrey, God does not do these things for us; He waits for us to do them ourselves; as the poor lad's father waited for him to return. Till we are sorry for doing wrong we cannot get near to God. And by 'sorry' I do not mean just saying that we are sorry and going on doing the same thing again; but I mean what that verse says, forsaking the wickedness; that is returning to the Lord. Do you understand?"

There was a pause: his father turned and looked at Geoffrey: but he did not answer. He was thinking.

At last he said, "Father, if I do something just a very little wrong, am I bound to give it up? I don't mean anything bad—but just not quite nice, perhaps."

"Anything which you know and feel to be 'not quite nice' you certainly are bound to give up, my boy. You can't make bargains to be allowed to do what is not quite right. What you have got to do is to give it up, if you even suspect that it is not quite nice. Did not Jesus say, 'Be ye perfect, as your Father in heaven is perfect?' If you keep on with what in your heart you suspect or know is not good, how can you hope that God will be 'to be found,' and 'near,' when you are shutting your shutters so that you may not see Him?"

Geoffrey sat a long time looking into the fire; then he got up and said, "I'll read that chapter now, father, before I forget; I hope we shall have that anthem again some day soon."

And as he went away he gently sang the music to himself.

GERTRUDE MARTINEAU.

A CORRESPONDENT sends us an interesting note in connection with the late Mr. William Grisbrook, of 6, Panton-street, Haymarket, and Lewisham, whose death, on April 15, aged seventy, was recently announced in our columns. He says:—"He was a somewhat remarkable man in his business of a picture and engraving restorer, &c. He used to attend Essex-street Chapel when the Rev. T. Madge was the minister; he afterwards was a member of Stamford-street Chapel for many years. He was one of the most skilful restorers of paintings and engravings. On one occasion a gentleman came to him with some old engravings to be put in order, but hesitated to entrust them to him, and determined to take them to a noted man in Paris, who, after looking at them, said:—'I recommend you to take them to a Mr. Grisbrook, somewhere in London; all that I know is that his work, which I have seen, is so good that I am sure you could not do better than entrust the engravings to him." Mr. Grisbrook, before he set up for himself, found out at the same time as his then master how to split the front of Bank of England notes from the back; curiously they did not adopt the same method. He was in the habit of splitting pictures in the Illustrated London News, &c., from the printing on the other side, and transferring them to white paper, which very greatly improved their appearance. The Duchess of Argyll, before her marriage, used to call on Mr. Grisbrook, when he lived in York-road, Lambeth, with work for him to execute."

THE UNITING OF CHURCHES.

MOVEMENTS of great significance in the religious world have taken place of recent years, making towards a closer union of Churches long separated by sectarian differences and too often by intolerance and bitterness in strange contrast with the Christian profession of each. The most effectual was that accomplished last year in Scotland, when two great denominations actually became one, merging their educational and other institutions and joining forces as the United Free Church of Scotland. Different in character, but hardly less significant of a happy change in the religious atmosphere of Protestant Dissent, has been the steady growth of the Federation of the Evangelical Free Churches in this country, a drawing together which does not interfere with separate denominational institutions, but unites members of different Churches in closer sympathies, in mutual counsel, and in common evangelistic work.

Last week another new departure was taken by two of the great denominations of this country, in a simple act of brotherly fellowship, which may not lead very far, but which to some of the participants has seemed prophetic of another actual union of separate Churches, which may have even more far-reaching results than the Scottish act of last year.

The Baptist and Congregational Unions, holding their annual meetings in London during the same week, agreed, after the transaction of their separate business, to hold two sessions together, at which the annual addresses of the two presidents should be given to a united people. The proposal went no further. There was no suggestion that the time had come for merging the two denominations in one. But such an agreement was in itself a distinct achievement, and shows how much has already been accomplished in the drawing together in brotherly sympathy of the members of the different Churches.

The address of the Baptist President, Dr. MACLAREN, dealt with the great subject of preaching, a subject of the first concern in such an assembly, and one with which he had a pre-eminent right to deal; but Dr. JOSEPH PARKER, the President of the Congregational Union, took a bolder flight, attacking the question for which such a united session was clearly a challenge.

"The United Congregational Church" was the subject of his address, which dealt chiefly with the conditions, actual and possible, of the Congregational Body, of which he is so prominent a member; but this naturally suggested the further question why the Baptists who are also Congregationalists should not come in as members of such a Church, and the address went even further, and looked towards the Presbyterians, who with mutual concessions might also add their strength to a united Evangelical Church.

Dr. PARKER's treatment of the subject was of great interest, and suggested several questions which might well be considered in our own connection. His plea was for a united body, with a representative and responsible assembly, which the present Congregational Union is not, and which should be able to turn to the best account all the forces of Congregationalism in the country. The unit in such a United Church must always remain "the individual (self-sustaining) Church." That unit, he said, must be most strenuously protected. "It means the warmth of home; it means the sobering and restraining discipline of local government; it means the education and quickening of personal responsibility." Of such units county unions have already been formed, for "neighbourly co-operation, near and close observation of local facts, mutual encouragement, and guidance."

The County Union is the point of equipoise between isolation in which sympathy is dead, and centralisation in which responsibility is lost.

And yet, Dr. PARKER urged, there was need in some form or other of "the total unit—the largest possible figure and expression of our spiritual force," and therefore he made his plea for "The United Congregational Church." Only so would they realise the truest conception of brotherhood, so that "rich Yorkshire will co-operate with Dorset, and commercial Lancashire will take agricultural Wilts to its heart." It would give to brethren toiling in difficult places a new sense of brotherhood, "a comforting and inspiring feeling of living and healing sympathy—a sense of supervision without a taint of espionage."

Resources would then be put to their best use. Has Congregationalism, it was asked, any real need for some seven or eight theological colleges? Are the many charities, funds, and trusts connected with the Body put to their best use? What must be done with almost abandoned City chapels? Cannot better use be made of lay agencies and woman's work? Such questions as these would all be best dealt with by the Body as a whole, by the United Church, acting through its responsible and trusted representatives. This, he strongly urged, would be the true development of their Congregationalism, by which alone it would meet the needs of the present time. He deprecated the dread of some mysterious kind of ecclesiastical authority, but acknowledged that it would be necessary to establish a Ministerial Sustentation Fund, in the benefits of which only duly recognised ministers could participate, so that there would have to be definite conditions of admission, with tests of character if not of collegiate training; and further, it would be necessary for the United Church "to work under some Declaratory Act by which it would publicly testisfy to the unity and vitality of its Evangelical convictions."

So the lines of the ideal were traced out, and it will be interesting to notice how these suggestions are received by the Churches immediately concerned. If such a United Congregational Church as Dr. PARKER foreshadowed should eventually be organised, it is clear that its official attitude towards Unitarians must be that of the Evangelical Free Church Councils. It must insist on the "unity and vitality of its Evangelical convictions." The Churches which will form Dr. PARKER's United Church are "blood-redeemed and sanctified," and Dr. MACLAREN, in his address, laid stress on the same point, insisting that their ministry "must all centre in the Death for the world's sins"; while Dr. RAINY, Moderator of the United Free Church of Scotland, who spoke at one of the meetings, showed the bent of his mind by declaring that while the working-classes are too much alienated from the Church, yet in his belief there is amongst them "a strong infusion of Christianity, mainly in its Evangelical form, and not in the ritualistic or Socinian form."

Now we suspect that Dr. RAINY has got plenty of "Socinians" in his own United Free Church, and we need not quarrel with the nickname; nor can we look with anything but respectful interest on the development of strong Evangelical Churches in this country; but while we might have hoped, and may still hope for a different development, we find here a distinct call to our Free Churches, not only to learn on their part to make the best use of all their resources, but to realise more clearly, and more strenuously to maintain, their own ideal of church life.

Our churches are not pledged to any doctrine of Atonement, "blood-redeemed"; they are pledged simply to the worship of the living GOD, in single-hearted devotion to truth, as He shall make it clear to us. Our Christian discipleship leads us not to "Evangelical" doctrine, but to an ever-deepening conviction that human brotherhood, in the spirit of JESUS, brings us nearest to the FATHER. Here is the call to us, to prove the reality and power of our religious life, and the spiritual foundation of our churches, and to vindicate our Christianity not so much by argument as by the demonstration of its effectual ministry to all human needs.

APRIL AT CONISTON.

NATURE does not reserve everything for the townsman's vacation, but has always something happening which is full of interest. She is truly seen and understood only by those who live with her, and is not merely on show at dinner-time dressed up for the occasion when the fashionable or unhealthy or holiday folks come to visit her. Unlike a city belle, she is best appreciated by those who know her at home, morning, noon, and night, summer and winter, spring and autumn. The Lake District of England has had many distinguished literary and artistic men who have known this, and have therefore lived, not sojourned there. Among those whose memory dwells near Coniston, and who have helped to make the district memorable, are two of especial significance in the life of England—Wordsworth and Ruskin. The poet whose schooldays were spent at Hawkeshead, four miles away, gloried in the district round about him in his boyish days, and spent his maturity not far away; and Ruskin's more recent and intimate connection with Coniston is now a part of its records and its life. He loved the beauty of the scene, not less than did the poet of Nature, and with a more tender and far-reaching love of human nature.

Spring at Coniston, April showers of sleet and rain, trees just budding, primroses and daffodils, mountains changing from hour to hour in sun and shadow, cloud and clearness, and the lake never the same two hours together—spring has its charm, and April brings experiences not given to the summer visitor. On the mountains many characteristics of Alpine scenery are open to view with such rapid alterations, however, as are seldom met with on the Alps. Wide expanses of snow-clad peaks and snow-covered uplands, not difficult to climb, though presenting some of the obstacles known to climbers among the eternal snows, have a fascination of a special kind. The winter's snows have nearly gone, but a fresh fall has made the ground all white, a snow field lies before us spreading far around, with some rough crags too precipitous to lodge the flakes however fast and frequently they fall, and in the distance, so far as eye can see, are snow-clad peaks and slopes shining in the sun, or for a while veiled in the mist of a passing snow shower. Anon we see such a shower blowing rapidly towards us, enveloping us in a rush of soft hailstones or rounded snow-flakes, we hardly know which. We are in the midst of a dim whiteness, and cannot see more than fifty yards ahead; but knowing it is April and that we saw the coming shower, as also we observed the grey eclipse of other peaks and their early reappearance in the light of day in still more dazzling brightness than before, we can have no fear, but we shelter beneath a rock and the remnants of an umbrella broken in probing snow drifts, and in half-an-hour we safely look round again upon the wide expanse of snow-land on all sides and the smiling lake and the green freshness of the Duddon Valley.

Along this Duddon Valley, as we descend towards the river's golden outlet to the sea, we have Wordsworth for our guide and comrade, and beautiful indeed are the little hills of the upper part of the valley, the rippling and rushing streams which there gather together, the wild flowers, the trees full of new life spreading out their leaves to the sun. A few homesteads, an occasional bridge, the stepping-stones and the Scathwaite parsonage, the Ulpha church, these and many other things recorded by Wordsworth now recall him to mind in generous recompense for his high appreciation of their simple charm and interest and his poet's tale about them.

On the lower reaches of the river, just before it receives Ocean's salt tribute, where it remains fresh and rippling and youthful, it wanders in April through a mead of yellow spring flowers. In little more than a mile along its shores a million daffodils look down upon it from the slanting banks. A million—this is not a vague exaggeration, but a fairly accurate calculation of the Nature lover who carries with him some of the predilections of the age for scientific exactness, yet not an actual counting, for long ere such were completed would spring and summer with all their flowers be gone. Who would not see a million daffodils rather than a thousand smoking chimneys! A million daffodils and each one of them too lovely to be gathered, each deserving to be left to shine out its little day of life—what a picture of Nature's wealth and generosity!

Hawkeshead, on the other side of Coniston, is quaint and interesting for its own sake as well as its association with Wordsworth, and he who lives even a little while near Coniston, who loves England in her best of natural beauty and her best of inspired humanity, will not easily find full content till he has lingered about its queer passages and arches and corners and protruding upper stories; but being a child of his own time he may turn with yet deeper affection to the place where Ruskin dwelt by Coniston water, whence the Old Man and the dark deep recess of the mountains between him and Wetherlam are seen in their full grandeur across the still lake enshrined in trees and meadows. There are no high walls or lofty hedges to hinder the view from the road near Brantwood.

What the owner saw from his study window the passer-by could also see. With such a prospect why could not the occupant of Brantwood rest content? Should not we be content had we such pleasant place and opportunity? No, indeed; not if, like him, we so loved Nature that our love rose highest for human nature. The poor pleasure in Nature as a setting for our excellence has no prophecy in it. The Seer cannot rest in the satisfaction that leaves out of count withering flowers of humanity in city slums, broken lives of men and women, rills of innocence early fouled, cloud-capped mountains of possible attainment hidden from most men by the greed of gain. While the children of men are oppressed by conditions of ugliness, monotony, and poverty of life, there is heartbreak for the prophet even among the glories and goodness of this fair scene. That which stunts and destroys the common life of common men and women perverts or saddens the genius of the greatest and best.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE RELIGION OF THE INCARNATION.

SIR,—My object in writing is to say that, instead of answering isolated points which have been urged in the course of this correspondence, I propose to avail myself of your hospitable invitation to contribute to THE INQUIRER an expository article on the doctrine of the Incarnation. In the meantime my thanks are due to Mr. Hawkes, Mr. Lloyd Thomas, Mr. Crook, and Dr. Klein for their suggestive letters.

Mr. Lloyd's conception of the temper in which spiritual things may be discussed differs from mine. I welcome his tardy admission of not being in either virtual or partial doctrinal agreement with me; but the general tone of his letter protects him effectually from any further reply.

J. WARSCHAUER.

SIR,—I believe all the great Catholic doctrines are wider than any one expression of them, and to limit the doctrine of Incarnation, which is not even an exclusively Christian doctrine, to one narrow phase of it, and accuse all who use it with a wider interpretation of something like dishonesty is hardly a reasonable, or even a seemly proceeding. What hope can there be of a progressive theology on such lines?

As Free Christians we are surely heirs to all the splendid heritage of Catholic doctrine, and free to adapt it to the needs of the new time, rejecting what has lost its value for us, and re-expressing, if need be, what is of permanent value. In your extracts from the writings of the late Mr. Binns, published in the last issue of THE INQUIRER, a doctrine of Incarnation is plainly suggested. "The divine idea was in man, and man had a yearning after God which ultimately shaped itself into an idea of Him from the beginning, from the time that man was man." This comes little short of an older and more sacred affirmation—"And the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us." The doctrine of the Incarnation affirms that the "idea" and the Word are the Son of God, and that the historic expression of that idea and word is the life of the Man of Nazareth.

To say that Unitarians should not use this doctrine is to deny them the very motive power of the religion of Christ. It is the word of the Cross that is the power of God, it is the crucified incarnate Son who can alone rouse to new life the Christ in every man. This is what has moved the world, and can do it again: this is the religion of the Incarnation.

CLEMENT E. PIKE.

SIR,—Like others who have written to you, I could not on any account use some of the phrases Dr. Warschauer has used with reference to Jesus. His doctrine, or his use of words, or both, are, in my judgment, unreasonable.

To test his use of words, take "Incarnation." It is, no doubt, possible to find examples in history of very broad interpretations of this word. Speaking of a pantheistic school which developed the ideas of Erigena, Albert Réville says:—"In their system God was the essence, the origin, and the end of every creature. The incarnation was eternal. Every pious man was in a special manner an incarnation of the Holy Spirit, a Christ in whom God became man." ("History of the Dogma of the Deity of Christ," 167.) This seems to favour Dr. Warschauer. But, unfortunately, the announcement of such a doctrine of incarnation aroused the Church to the danger of Erigena's teaching, which was forthwith condemned centuries after his death. Again, of the German mystics Eckart, Tauler and others, Réville says:—"The dogma of the Incarnation was to them little more than the typical expression of the idea that the higher life of the spirit is a life of God within us," &c. (p. 168). But the mystics have always been the few, and they have generally been considered by the majority as almost, if not quite, beyond the bounds of orthodoxy—witness the history of the Quakers. Of course, a man may use a term in any sense he pleases, if he explains his meaning every time there is danger of serious misunderstanding. Moreover, it is well to try as often as possible to find common ground between ourselves and others, by penetrating beneath forms and phrases to the thoughts and feelings which they cover. But the systematic adoption of forms and phrases which generally imply much more or much less than our own thoughts and feelings, is, to say the least, a very hazardous thing, and may be very absurd. Dr. Martineau sought "a way out of the Trinitarian controversy" by just such a process of penetration as I have described; but, though he found a good deal of common ground between the Trinitarian and the Unitarian, he did not, I think, propose to define Unitarianism as "The Religion of the Trinity."

H. RAWLINGS.

P.S.—What a great difference the little word "the" makes! Suppose we omit it from the phrase under discussion, and speak of "the Religion of Incarnation." The principal objections urged against Dr. Warschauer and the orthodox are rendered pointless by this simple change. The word Incarnation, thus used, loses its miraculous and limiting implications.

There still remains the question whether Christianity teaches the idea of Incarnation with any special emphasis or depth of meaning—sufficient to justify us in calling it "the Religion of Incarnation"—and I can only say that, in my opinion, we shall not find here a mark distinctive enough for that title.

THE HISTORY OF UPPER CHAPEL.

SIR,—Kindly allow me a few words in reply to your note in last week's INQUIRER. My critic in the Athenæum (to whom I am indebted for a useful notice) asks what kind of an Episcopalian could there (in Cromwell's time) be found to accept a Church living, when he might not use the Prayer-book. The reply is that some Episcopalians actually did use the Prayer-book, either by connivance of the authorities, or by its use memoriter, or by written excerpts. The Scottish Episcopalians did not use a Prayer-book, and found no grievance in the Ordinance forbidding its use.

It is quite true that in Cromwell's time the Prayer-book was forbidden; but it is equally true (and this the reviewer forgets to tell his readers) that the reading of it in pubiic was frequently connived at. It was impossible to prevent its use in private. Evelyn, in his "Diary," repeatedly mentions cases of connivance—e.g., under April 15, 1655: "I went to London with my family to celebrate ye feast of Easter. Dr. Wild preached at St. Gregorie's; the Ruling Powers conniving at ye use of the Liturgy, &c., in this Church alone." So Dec. 3, 1654: "I seldome went to Church on solemne feasts, but either went to London, where some of the orthodox sequestred Divines did privately use ye Common Prayer, administer Sacraments, &c., or else I procur'd one to officiate in my house." He mentions Dr. Richard Owen as doing this in his library. Lathbury ("Hist. Book of Common Prayer," p. 295) says: "Many used the Common Prayer in private, and on some occasions in churches; but no permission was granted under the Presbyterians." That is the fact, and my critic appears to ignore it. The Ordinance enforcing the Directory was passed in 1645—an intolerant and foolish measure, "the first fruits of Presbyterian uniformity" (Neal). But Cromwell never approved it. It was none of his doing. Lathbury says: "Later Cromwell, who, had he been unfettered, would have allowed the use of the Liturgy as well as the Directory, granted more liberty, and the Episcopal clergy sometimes read the Common Prayer in the Churches." He further says that when, in Cromwell's time, the clergy were persecuted for using the Common Prayer "he acted to please others"; whereas in permitting its use, "he followed his own real views."

The words selected by the Athenæum reviewer from my History for criticism are entirely in harmony with these well-known facts. J. E. MANNING.

THE WHIT-WEEK MEETINGS.

REDUCED RAILWAY FARES.

SIR,—I have much pleasure in informing your readers that the Railway Companies given below have agreed to issue first and third class return tickets to London at a single fare and a quarter for the double journey to persons attending the Whit-week Meetings, such tickets to be available from the day before to the day after the Meetings. The tickets will, therefore, be issued from May 24 to May 31, and will be available for returning up to, and including, June 1. The tickets will be issued on giving up to the booking clerks a voucher personally signed by the Secretary, the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie. Vouchers will be forwarded to anyone sending a stamped and addressed envelope to Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

The following Railway Companies will issue these tickets:—Great Western, London and North Western, Great Northern, Midland, Great Central, London, Brighton and South Coast, London and South Western, Great Eastern, South Eastern and Chatham.

While the Meetings are proceeding, cheap return tickets at a single fare and a quarter (minimum 1s.) will also be issued by the same Railway Companies from London to any station not more than fifty miles distant, available to return the same or following day. Tickets issued on Saturday will be available to Monday.

I hope these privileges will induce a large number of persons to attend from the country, and it will also be a benefit to persons living a short distance from London.

MARTINEAU'S "ENDEAVOURS."

SIR,—A friend said to me the other day, "I recently gave Martineau's 'Endeavours after a Christian Life' to an intelligent religious inquirer who was delighted with it. I should much like to give it away to others who would appreciate it, but I really cannot afford the high price, 7s. 6d. If an edition were brought out at 2s. 6d. I would gladly at once take four copies, for I am sure the dissemination of such a work would do great good. Is there any hope of a cheap reprint being published?" I could not answer the question, but I send it on to you, asking you to use your influence towards securing a favourable reply to it. Surely our best way of showing respect to him whom we all honour would be to extend the good influence of his writings. An inexpensive reprint of the one in question would be a worthy work for the British and Foreign Unitarian Association to undertake.

TO BE GIVEN AWAY.

SIR,—Would you kindly make it known in THE INQUIRER that the late hon. secretary of the Rosslyn-hill School, Miss Higginson, 42, Denning-road, Hampstead, has school books and slates to give away to any of our Ministers or Missionaries who can make use of them. The books are mostly Readers suitable for infants and for children up to the Fourth Standard. Some are good Historical and Geographical Readers. E. L. LISTER.

"PILGRIM'S PROGRESS."

SIR,—I see a notice that a perfect copy of the first edition of "Pilgrim's Progress" is to be sold by Messrs. Sotheby, on May 9. Some of your readers may be interested in knowing that there is another edition of "Pilgrim's Progress," perhaps even more in demand than the first English edition.

It is the first edition published in America. There is no doubt that such an edition was published, for Bunyan says so distinctly in one of his prefaces. But no copy of it, I think, is now known. I write this note to you because I think that in some old library in England a copy of the New England edition may be found. If I were to speak from a Philistine point of view, I should say that such a volume would easily be sold for much more than its value in its weight of gold.

SUNDAY SCHOOL SINGING.

CHORAL COMPETITION AT ESSEX HALL.

After an interval of two years the series of choral competitions instituted by the London Sunday-School Society was resumed on Saturday afternoon, April 27, at Essex Hall. The object of these choral contests being the improvement of the general singing in our Sunday-schools, it may be useful to superintendents and teachers in other parts of the country if a few points, emphasised by the adjudicator on this occasion, Mr. C. J. Dale, are brought to their notice.

The details of this particular meeting, which was the seventh of the kind, need not be given at any length. There were seven choirs in attendance—a smaller number than on previous occasions; but if the quantity was less the quality was undoubtedly as high as ever. The schools represented were, respectively, Islington (conductor, Miss Harris), Hackney (Mr. Lincoln Taylor), Newington Green (Miss Maud E. Turner), Wandsworth (Mr. H. W. James), Highgate (Mr. W. Sedgfield), Kentish Town (Mr. E. J. Scruton), and Brixton (Miss a Burridge). The rules prescribed that not more than twenty, and not fewer than sixteen, singers should be in each choir, and that at least two-thirds of these must be under the age of sixteen. A test piece, "Welcome, fair Eventide" (Roeckel), had to be sung, unaccompanied, by each choir; and a second piece, chosen by the choir itself, was added in each case, being accompanied or not at discretion. The trials took place in the order given above, this order having been determined by lot. The result was that Newington Green bore off the banner as the best choir of the year, and Brixton obtained second place. The friends of each of the remaining five choirs may be assured that, had a third distinction been given——! It should be added that tea was served to the choristers and other scholars, as well as to a considerable party of adult friends who were present as audience and critics.

Mr. Dale, who is an accomplished musician of great experience in adjudications of the same kind, often on the more magnificent scale of Crystal Palace contests, and who, it should be said, is wholly unconnected with our schools (as the rules stipulate), made his award in an address marked by much humour, sympathy, and discrimination. He said he had never had greater pleasure in attending a contest of the kind. The average advance in singing—among children, we understood—had been very remarkable during the last twenty years. The standard of that day's performances was really a high one, and even the least successful choir had done well. Criticising, one by one, the different choirs, the defects he chiefly noticed were occasional false notes, some unevenness of movement of the parts, imperfect intonation, and improper division of syllables. False starts, though doubtless accidental, and mistakes in time, did not escape his vigilant ear. But, like all good critics, Mr. Dale had been as watchful to observe merits as defects. He praised the excellent discipline specially exhibited by several choirs; the evident attention given in such cases by all the singers to their conductor; the admirable distribution of light and shade in the best renderings; the clear utterance of the words, and the refinement of expression that showed where there had been most careful attention, even to individual voices. The general brightness of tone, and the pleasure in singing exhibited by all, were also highly commended; and then Mr. Dale ended his address by the announcement of his awards, which evidently commanded the hearty assent of the audience.

A pleasant concert was given in the evening under the direction of Mr. W. Sedgfield; the united choirs sang part-songs, and solos were given by Miss Lily Sedgfield and Mr. W. Savage Cooper; Miss Gertrude Nobbs also assisted with the violin. At the opening of the concert, Mr. Howard Young (President) said the object of the London Sunday School Society was as much as possible to raise the standard of singing in the different schools, and no doubt there had been a real improvement. Not only was the competition, and the training for it, of benefit to the individuals and their schools, but home-singing must profit also. The association of noble thoughts with good music helped to fix those thoughts in the memory; and in times of happiness or of trouble such thoughts were of real help and comfort. He concluded by announcing that each competitor would receive a card specially printed as a memento of the day's interesting proceedings.

In commending the idea to friends elsewhere, the thought occurs that possibly the general singing in the schools would be improved more directly if, along with the study and practice of the glees or part-songs chosen for these occasions, some half-dozen useful hymn-tunes were prescribed for special preparation, and one or other of them were chosen to be sung without further notice before the adjudicator. Of course some care would be needed to select words the repetition of which would not seriously impair their effect, or jar in any way on the finer feelings which even children should be led to cultivate.

LIVERPOOL DOMESTIC MISSION.

The annual meeting of this Society was held at the Mission-house, Mill-street, on Tuesday evening, April 23. A considerable number of supporters and friends were present, although the attendance was not quite so large as in some previous years. Letters of apology and regret were read from Mr. A. F. Warr, M.P., Sir John T. Brunner, Bart., M.P., Sir Wm. H. Tate, Sir Edward R. Russell, Mr. Charles W. Jones, Mr. E. K. Muspratt, and Mr. Alfred Booth.

The chair was taken by the President, Mr. Walter Holland, and among those present were the Revs. R. A. Armstrong, L. de Beaumont Klein, H. W. Hawkes, James Harwood, also the Missionaries, the Revs. T. Lloyd Jones and Mr. Anderton, Alderman W. B. Bowring, Mr. R. D. Holt, Miss Bowring, Miss Rathbone, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Holt, Mr. and Mrs. F. Robinson, Mr. and Mrs. A. W. Hall, Mr. Richard Robinson, Mr. J. H. Rawlins, Mr. R. W. Manning, Mr. Forwood Heyn, and Mr. and Mrs. H. Coventry.

At the outset the Chairman made a feeling allusion to the death of Mr. H. W. Meade-King, and it was decided to send a letter of condolence to Mrs. Meade-King, on behalf of the meeting.

The annual report of the Committee was read by the secretary (Mr. H. Coventry), and the statement of accounts by the deputy treasurer (Mr. F. Heyn).

The report inter alia, welcomed the action of the magistrates at the last licensing sessions, at which the number of licenses in Toxteth Park had been reduced by eleven.

The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the report and the statement of accounts, referred to the state of affairs socially sixty-five years ago, when the mission was founded, and the part that the mission had had in the improvement that was to be seen around them. With regard to the finances, he had the gratification to announce three generous donations of £250 in all, but he impressed upon the meeting that it was really an increase in annual subscriptions that was required.

Dr. Klein, in seconding the resolution, referred to the work being carried on at the mission, as undoubtedly laying down the social foundations of the future.

A resolution of sympathy with the missionaries was moved by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, who referred to the long service of both the missionaries, the Rev. T. Lloyd Jones and Mr. Anderton (about eighteen and twenty-one years respectively). He also reminded the meeting of the obligation under which they lay to the large band of voluntary workers, one or two of whom had, perhaps, been working there longer even than the missionaries. He mentioned the temperance question as being "always with us," and went on to dwell with great earnestness upon the necessity of dealing radically with the evil of overcrowding and the great housing question. He quoted some startling figures, showing that even with all the improvement that had been made a scandalous state of things existed in Liverpool, which called for immediate action.

Mr. Robert Holt, C.C., in seconding the motion, said the question was an extremely difficult one, and the Corporation were doing their utmost to grapple with it.

Mr. Alderman Bowring, in supporting, also said that the Corporation were dealing with the matter, and things had been improved.

After the resolution had been carried with acclamation the Rev. T. Lloyd Jones and Mr. Anderton briefly replied, the former mentioning that the Bishop of Liverpool had recently paid a visit to the Mission, and he (Mr. Lloyd Jones) hoped that their Church of England neighbours were beginning to look upon the Mission with more kindly feelings.

After the election of committee and officers a vote of thanks to the President was passed, on the motion of the Rev. James Harwood, a former honorary secretary of the Society, who referred to the fact of his coming back to Liverpool and finding Mr. Holland still working for the Mission, as he was twenty-three years ago, thus bringing to a close a most encouraging meeting.

ULSTER UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETING IN BELFAST.

THE annual meeting in connection with this Association was held on Monday evening last in the Central Hall, Rosemary-street, Belfast, Mr. Bowman Malcolm, C.E., presiding. There was a large attendance, which included the Revs. William Napier, J. Collins Odgers, J. A. Kelly, S. H. Mellone, Thomas Dunkerley, Joseph Pollard, George J. Slipper, Alexander Ashworth, W. J. Davies, Richard Lyttle, R. M. King, R. J. Orr, W. G. Marsden, H. A. M'Gowan, Dr. Orr; Messrs. John Rogers, James Davidson (Windsor), Robert M'Giffin, C. J. M'Kisack, Robert Gault, Walter Roberts, James M'Kisack, William M'Ninch, John Roberts, John M'Ninch, H. B. Hunter, C. Gordon, James M'Williams, David Young, C. R. Lowry, L. C. D. M'Caw, C. M. Cunningham, Robert M'Crum, James Davidson (Knock), Alexander Hall, David Young, Richard Hall, George Hill, Robert M'Ninch, R. E. M. Scott, and S. Kelliher.

The Rev. J. A. KELLY, hon. secretary, read the twenty-fifth annual report, which showed that there had been a growing demand for literature expository of their principles, and consequently a larger number of tracts, &c., had been given away. It was with considerable pleasure the Committee had to report that the collecting of the annual subscriptions had been put on a more business-like footing, and they considered the thanks of the Association were due to the local treasurers and collectors for their services during the year. It was cheering to be able to report that a number of new local treasurers had been appointed since the last annual meeting, and they would once more ask their friends in each district or congregation where there was not yet such an official to secure one before the new century was many weeks older. It was with sincere regret that they had to record the loss by death of many staunch and valued subscribers and friends of the Association. A loyal resolution had been sent to the King on the occasion of the death of Queen Victoria, and it had been duly acknowledged.

Proceeding, the report stated :—

At the last annual meeting you heartily approved of the raising of a special fund in commemoration of the twentieth century, and you gave full power to us, your Committee, to "take the matter in hand, and prosecute it to a successful issue." In regard to this important matter we have done our best. We drew up, after careful consideration, a circular, had it printed, and sent early in the year to all the Unitarian ministers and the great majority of stipend payers in Unitarian congregations in Ulster, and a few others outside Ulster. We have received a good number of cheering replies, but there are many who have not yet responded. We would ask them kindly to do so before the end of November of this year. Postal Mission Report—The ladies in charge of the Postal Mission report seventy-five applications during the year ended April 21, 1901. A few of these were from persons already in sympathy with our views; but by far the greater number seemed to be from genuine "inquirers." From the nature of the work it is difficult to estimate results. Several letters of thanks have been received, and in no case has any disapprobation been expressed, so that it may be inferred that the "declaration" and pamphlets sent were duly appreciated. From these expressions and other evidences we may safely conclude that the simple Scriptural form of Christianity which this Association desires to promote is being increasingly appreciated outside our own household of faith; and if the funds at our disposal admitted of more extensive advertisement of this mission, there can be no doubt that we should be the means of doing a nobler service by increasing men's knowledge of our principles, which are at once simple and comprehensive, satisfying and consoling, reasonable and Scriptural, and which are to be found in that kind of Christianity known as Unitarian.

The financial statement was also submitted by the Secretary, and showed a balance on hands of £54 15s. 5d.; and an increase of receipts upon the previous year.

The CHAIRMAN, in moving the adoption of the report and statement of accounts, and that best thanks be given to the local treasurers and collectors for their services during the past year, said the most important point to his mind was the paragraph in the circulated letter with regard to the new century scheme—that was, that increased funds would enable that Association to throw more light on the darkness that prevailed around them regarding what Unitarian Christianity really was. He took it that that was very largely the beginning and end of that Association, and he would strongly suggest to the officers of the Association that the letter should be again sent out to all Unitarians. Another point to which he wished to refer was with regard to the number of their friends who had passed away during the past twelve months. Their place had to be filled, and it seemed to him that possibly they did not get the same fine men and women to take the lead in matters of that kind as they had in the past, and it would require a very considerable effort to get things as they had been in the past, although from their Secretary's account of the finances of the Association they seemed to be prospering. He would recommend therefore that a repetition of the letter to which he had referred be distributed in the way indicated, and that everyone increase their subscriptions.

Mr. J. DAVIDSON (Windsor), in seconding the motion, said he thought there was a fairly well recognised feeling amongst them all that that Society was doing a very useful and very necessary work in connection with the dissemination of the particular form of Christianity which they as Unitarians believed in, and were anxious to promulgate amongst their friends and neighbours. The report, he thought, showed that the Society was fairly well alive. Moreover, the Society was taking steps to keep itself alive by asking for increased subscriptions, and especially donations. The Postal Mission, he might say, was a new departure taken up about two or three years ago. It had been attended to by three ladies connected with their body, and who were in the habit of communicating with applicants for literature bearing upon the doctrines which they as Unitarians held.

The motion was unanimously passed.

On the motion of Mr. JOHN ROGERS, seconded by Mr. C. M. CUNNINGHAM, a resolution welcoming the Rev. J. Collins Odgers, and thanking him for his able and impressive sermons in aid of the Association, was cordially passed.

The Rev. J. COLLINS ODGERS, who was received with applause, having referred to the object of the Association and the effects of the dissemination of their literature, pointed out that in the past year Dr. Martineau had died, and on all sides there was a chorus of praise from all sects and parties with regard to Dr. Martineau. After having referred to the names of Unitarians who were high and well known in the great sphere of philanthropy, he said the things he had mentioned were some of the grand and noble virtues the seeds of which were sown by the truths and principles which they as a society were disseminating. Let them in their day and generation be active and manly and true to the principles which they confessed—truths for which their fathers suffered so much in the days gone by, truths which even in that enlightened and advanced age were still worth fighting for, living for, dying for, until the coming of the kingdom of God.

The following resolution was passed, on the motion of the Rev. T. DUNKERLEY, seconded by the Rev. J. A. KELLY:—"That this meeting heartily commends the recent twentieth century appeal to the favourable consideration of the friends of the Association."

The Rev. WM. NAPIER (Clough) moved, and the Rev. W. J. DAVIES seconded, the following proposition, which was carried:—"That this meeting renews its adhesion to the principles and objects of the Association as set forth in the rules."

At intervals in the course of the proceedings solos were contributed by Miss Gordon and Mr. C. Gordon with much acceptance, Mrs. Kelly accompanying. The Committee for the ensuing year was appointed.

A vote of thanks to the Chairman was followed by the Benediction, and the proceedings terminated.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

MANCHESTER DISTRICT.

AFTER an inspiring winter's work we have slackened our speed, and intend recuperating in the long summer days for whatever fresh labours may be in store for us next winter. Looking back upon the past six or seven months one finds encouragement for persistent effort. We made no attempt to open up new ground. Our hands have been too full for that; we have been anxious to see all our new Forward Movement churches completed, and the congregations worshipping in them becoming consolidated. The four school-chapels we have erected provide very satisfactory accommodation, are pleasing in architecture, and are all capable of extension whenever the necessity should arise. The building of four new edifices of this character is no small achievement; it has cost more than the promoters of the scheme originally anticipated. It has run away with nearly all our money; and yet there has been no extravagance whatever. Indeed, one of the buildings—and that the largest of the four—is already almost too small to accommodate the large number of scholars who have joined the Sunday-school. It has been found necessary to spend about £9,000 upon these buildings and for the land upon which they stand. In two cases the land has been bought outright, in another a sum has been set aside by way of guaranteeing the chief rent, and in the case of the fourth, where the congregation is strong enough to entirely manage its own affairs, the land is held on chief by the church in the ordinary way. This is really a great deal to have done for the sum mentioned, which, by the way, has not all come out of our Bazaar Fund. In three out of four cases the congregations have been able to raise fairly considerable sums to supplement our grants, for the cost of building has gone up tremendously, and without some strenuous local effort, the churches could not have been opened free of debt. I have just been roughly estimating the financial efforts of our Manchester District Churches during the last five years, and I find no difficulty in making out that as much as £30,000 has in that period been spent in providing improved or additional church property. This seems almost incredible; and yet it is rather understated than overstated. It indicates surely that there is no diminution in our enthusiasm, and that we are still prepared to practice self-sacrifice in a good cause. There may be more things we ought to do and might do; but this, at any rate, we have not left undone.

Our Forward Movement Churches are emerging from the state of infancy. They are beginning to walk alone. They are anxious to get out of leading strings. Chorlton already has a minister of its own. At Heaton Moor and Urmston the Association has appointed a missionary to have full charge, up to the present; but the arrangement will shortly terminate, and those two churches will have, in a month or two, ministers of their own. They will thenceforth be called "Assisted Churches," receiving an annually diminishing grant from the Association in support of the ministry. Signs of encouragement are not wanting at any of these places. The spirit of determination which is manifested gives us hope that in the next few years much growth and increase of resource will be recorded, and that these churches will become largely self-supporting.

The responsibilities of the Association are, however, heavy, and must remain so for some years to come, even if no fresh work is undertaken, for its resources are straitened, and it will have to continue its appeal for sustained financial help. This past winter its thoughts were turned towards the problem as to how it could help the older churches which were in need of assistance of any kind. Special services and lectures were offered to them, and those who availed themselves of the offer have felt that they have been benefited thereby. During the month of February twenty-nine services were arranged in connection with six churches, and all of them were held in our own church buildings; thirteen of them were held on week-evenings and sixteen on Sundays. The Sunday congregations were highly satisfactory; and so were some of the week-evening attendances; but during some portion of the time political interests conflicted and brought down the average. Still, the district was flooded with bills and literature, and we are not going to pretend to know the extent of the influence of this effort for lasting good. The services of all our special preachers were highly appreciated; but there was one thing more than all else which pleased and surprised us, and that was the power and eloquence of our veterans. The Revs. J. Page Hopps and James C. Street came amongst us as fresh and as buoyant as young men, yet with ripe wisdom added to their eloquence which everywhere made a deep impression. They both seem to have found the secret of rejuvenation; and the general verdict in this district is that never were they more powerful, more heart-stirring, more convincing than they are at the present time. If only they could be granted a roving commission, and we could see and hear them more frequently it would prove an immense benefit to us. The services rendered before Christmas by the late Rev. William Binns were also wonderfully impressive. The old man had mellowed in thought and feeling, and he seemed te revel in his preaching, and his face was lit up with a benignant smile that indicated an immovable certainty of faith; yet we saw that old age had fastened upon his frame and that physically he could not respond to all that his youthful spirit demanded. It was illness alone which prevented him from coming to us again after Christmas and taking part in our second series of services.

Since I last wrote, the friends at Blackley have opened their new Sunday-school, and a most convenient and bright building it is. The cost was £1,660, of which they had raised about £1,100. Towards securing the rest they held a bazaar in the new building last week, and by means of it they realised £300, leaving another £260 to get, somehow or other. The Sunday-schools of the district are taking collections amongst their scholars in order to show their sympathy and extend some help. It is to be hoped that the whole of the money needed will soon be forthcoming, as there is no doubt of the effort being highly deserving of assistance.

Our Strangeways Unitarians are to be sincerely congratulated upon the brave way in which they have looked facts in the face, and practically determined to change the venue of their church. It is undoubtedly a hard thing to do. Sentiment is a tender thing, and its roots go very deep; but they have looked at the question like business men, having in trust that which was not intended for the cultivated sentiment in a few, but for the spiritual uplifting of many. Thus much they have decided upon; and now they have to develop their plans. The neighbourhood of Strangeways has become monopolised by the Jews who are creeping out further and further into the suburb of Broughton irresistibly; the site upon which the church stands has largely increased in value, and from the common-sense point of view the just and right course to pursue is to sell the present property and build another church in the midst of a Christian population, whose needs it may more efficiently serve. This is an example which many another city church up and down the country might wisely follow.

The Rev. S. H. Street has left Manchester, and taken up his residence at Great Hucklow. We are all very sorry for the domestic sickness which has rendered such a removal necessary, and we trust he may be happy in his new sphere of work. Meanwhile Renshaw-street Mission is without a missionary, and thus far it seems that there are very few applicants for the vacant post. It is a splendid sphere of work for anyone who is really in religious sympathy with distinctly working-class people. There is a band of earnest helpers who only need inspiring and guiding; the district is a populous one; very many young people are attached to the Mission; agencies of various sorts are already admirably organised, and whoever goes there will find a sympathetic committee at his back.

The Manchester District Sunday School Association's Good Friday meetings were held at Gorton this year, and the attendance was a record one. Those who were present had an opportunity of inspecting the very handsome and commodious school, the architecture of which is in keeping with the beautiful church adjacent. The Rev. J. Page Hopps was the preacher at the morning service, and the Rev. Joseph Wicksteed, B.A., read the paper at the evening meeting. It is most pleasing to observe how the interest of these meetings is maintained year after year, and how happy all seem to be in renewing acquaintances and talking over school affairs. There is a feeling of regret all round that it will be impossible for the teachers of the Manchester District to go to the London Meetings in Whit-week. Our Southern friends do not seem to be able to understand what Whit-week is to our Lancashire Sunday-schools, and what responsibility of oversight rests upon our teachers in connection with the various trips that week. A sense of duty keeps both ministers and teachers at home then, and deprives them of the privilege and profit of attending the meetings in London. We are very much interested in the prospectus which has been issued, and are hoping that some of the virtue and inspiration of the proceedings may ultimately percolate down even to us poor preoccupied Northerners.

CHARLES ROPER.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Aberdeen.—At the last week's meeting of the School Board, the resignation of the Rev. Alexander Webster was received with regret. The Rev. Dr. Robertson (chairman) said while there were parts of Mr. Webster's policy which the majority of them were not able to understand or agree to, there were others with which they were in accordance, and they might note two of these that stood to his credit. The first was with regard to the question of child labour, and his views on that subject would not be lost sight of. The other matter was that of underfed children, and he had pressed that matter to such an extent that he (the chairman) thought it had been brought to a practical issue, and was a matter that they remembered to Mr. Webster's credit. He should like also to say that no member had been more courteous, more conciliatory, and more anxious to do what he could to help on the work of the board.

Atherton (Chowbent Chapel).—Mr. Charles Eckersley, J.P., a member of the congregation, having offered to the trustees the gift of a magnificent new organ more suited to the size of the chapel than the organ now in use, the present instrument, which is fine and sweet in tone, and is being presented to the new Unitarian Church at Chorlton-cum-Hardy, was used for the last time on Sunday in Chowbent Chapel, and during the week has been removed. A handsome and commodious vestibule, with an organ chamber above it, is being added to the chapel, and has been for some time in process of erection. The new organ is expected to be opened in June or July, and the Sunday services for the present month or longer are to be held in the large schoolroom.

Birmingham: Old Meeting Church.—On Sunday, April 28, collections were made on behalf of the choir fund. At the evening service Brahms' "German Requiem" was given for the anthem, by a choir of seventy voices and an orchestra of strings numbering sixteen. The difficult work was very finely rendered, under the direction of the organist of the church, Mr. C. J. Cotton. It was preceded by a short service, during which the Rev. J. Wood reminded the congregation that they were not met to enjoy a musical performance, but to take part in an act of gratitude and reverence for the mighty dead who, by their faith, genius, and labours, had helped the world forward, and not only for the world's great leaders, but for the kind, the true, and the brave whom they themselves had known and loved, and who had passed into the fuller life beyond. The church was filled to its utmost capacity, and the occasion was one of much musical interest in the city. The words of the Requiem were selected by Brahms from the Bible, and the work widely differs from the ordinary Requiem of the Roman Church. It well illustrates the grave and almost austere genius of Brahms, and is a fitting expression of the Protestant attitude towards the holy dead.

Boston.—On Thursday week a special service was held in Spain-lane Chapel, in recognition of the settlement of the Rev. W. Stoddart, B.A., as minister. The service was conducted by the Rev. Alfred Hall, of Norwich, the sermon being preached by the Rev. Henry Gow, of Leicester. After tea a public meeting of welcome was held, Mr. Austin Kime in the chair, among those present being the Rev. W. Stoddart, Miss Tagart (President of the Central Postal Mission), Miss Bontoft, the Revs. W. C. Hall and Alfred Hall (two old Boston boys), J. M. Lloyd Thomas (of Nottingham), D. Barnett, and J. Gibson (the last two being Nonconformist ministers of Boston). The Chairman and Miss Bontoff spoke very hopefully of Mr. Stoddart's settlement, the latter recalling an eloquent hospital sermon he had preached at Spain-lane many years ago, and referring with gratitude to the donation of £20 which had been received for the Old Chapel from Boston, Mass. Miss Tagart, replying to a vote of welcome to the visitors, described the work of the Postal Mission, which had taken a warm and practical interest in the reopening of the chapel. The Rev. W. C. Hall said that in virtue of his early connection with the chapel he had been appointed to welcome Mr. Stoddart, and he did so very cordially, commending him to the loyal support of the congregation. The Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, on behalf of the ministers of the district, and the Rev. D. Barnett, on behalf of the ministers of the town, joined in the welcome. The Rev. William Stoddart acknowledged the welcome which had been accorded to him, and thanked the two Nonconformist ministers of the town for their presence. He hoped, however much they differed theologically, they would always be good friends and be able to work together in practical Christianity. He could not but be touched by the expressions of confidence in him, which had been uttered by the different speakers, and he hoped that he would be able to realise their expectations. But, as Locksley, the Sherwood ranger said to King John, "A man can do but his best," and if a man did his best, even failure was no disgrace. But let them not talk of failure, success was what they must aim at, and that must be attained by earnest work and united efforts. If they had a mission in the world, a function in the economy of religious thought and life, then if they discharged that duty they would prosper. He spoke of improvements he hoped to see in the chapel, including a new organ, and he hoped that the gift they had received from America would form the nucleus of a renovation fund. Votes of thanks to the ministers who had officiated at the services and to the Unitarians of Boston, Mass, for their kind donation, were subsequently passed, and the meeting was brought to a close.

Carlisle.—The annual congregational supper was held on the 25th ult., when about 140 adults sat down to a well-prepared repast. After the supper a meeting was held, the Rev. C. Travers in the chair, supported by Mr. and Mrs. Arlosh, Mr. C. Dixon, Mr. W. Marchington, and Mr. Ridley. The Chairman, after expressing his pleasure at seeing so many present, and thanking on behalf of the Committee the ladies and gentlemen who had carried through the arrangements for the evening, called on Mr. Arlosh, who, in his own name and in that of Mrs. Arlosh, publicly presented for the use of the minister of the church for all time a new and substantial freehold house in Nelson-street, Carlisle. Mr. Travers, in the unavoidable absence of the secretary, responded, and on the motion of Mr. Dixon, seconded by Mr. Marchington, a hearty vote of thanks was accorded to Mr. and Mrs. Arlosh for their great generosity.

Huddersfield.—A successful "Cake and Apron" Sale was held in the schoolroom of the Fitzwilliam-street Church on April 24, which realised £24 8s. 10d. The Rev. W. Mellor, at the opening of the sale, explained that it was in a very real sense a preliminary to a much larger effort. They were preparing for a bazaar, which it was hoped to hold next year for the purpose of raising at least £200, needed for the cleaning and renovation of the church.

Hull.—On April 21 the church and school had the advantage of a visit by Miss Marian Pritchard, the occasion being the school anniversary. Miss Pritchard's inspiriting addresses were heard by good congregations, and her willing help and kind sympathy will be remembered with pleasure. In the afternoon Miss Maud Turner's "Service of Song" was given by the children. Mr. S. Harris, a leading member of the congregation, has just been elected a member of the Hull School Board.

London: Forest Gate.—A Jumble Sale has just been held at Upton-lane Church, the proceeds of which amounted to about £6. The Rev. H. W. Perris is just concluding a course of Sunday evening sermons on "Religion and Morals."

London: Stepney.—The monthly Conference on Sunday afternoon will be opened by Mr. J. R. Macdonald on "Brotherhood in Industry." It will be seen from the advertisement that prior to the annual meeting on Thursday evening a Fancy Sale is to be held at seven o'clock.

Padiham.—On Sunday last anniversary sermons were preached by the Rev. Frank Walters, of Newcastle-on-Tyne. In the afternoon a considerable congregation gathered to join in the service, and to hear a profound and stirring address upon the enduring value of Christ's Gospel. In the evening the chapel was filled by a congregation numbering some 600 persons. Mr. Walters spoke of the Gospel of to day, and showed with great power how modern destructive tendencies had only served to secure the essential foundations of religion; so long as we kept man and his human nature as the groundwork of faith, we could never be in want for a supreme manifestation of divine glory and love. The hymns were heartily joined in by the large congregation, and anthems were well rendered by the choir. The collections amounted to £30 0s. 11d.

Peckham (Presentation).—At a social meeting on Tuesday last, a testimonial, in the shape of a purse containing £23, was presented to Mr. and Mrs. R. Whitmore Cox, who for very many years have been honorary organists at the Avondale-road Church. Mr. J. Bredall, in a graceful speech, made the presentation on behalf of the subscribers, and took occasion to allude to the services of Mrs. Cox, when Miss Carter, in connection with the Band of Hope and the Sunday-school. Mr. Cox, in a few words broken by emotion, expressed his thanks for the kindly recognition of what had been to his wife and himself a labour of love.

Pentre: South Wales.—On Sunday, April 28, the church held its annual services, the Rev. J. Hathren Davies (Cefn) and the pastor, the Rev. David Rees, officiating. Owing to the great distance many of our people live from the chapel, services were only held in the afternoon and evening. The congregations were very good, especially in the evening. The amount of the collections was a decided improvement upon last year's. We were gratified to see present many of the Unitarians who are scattered over the adjoining valleys.

Scarborough.—The Rev. Ottwell Binns, late Congregational minister of Portland, has accepted an invitation to take charge of the Scarborough Church for three months, commencing May 5.

Southend. — A well-attended congregational soirée was held in Darnley road Church on Wednesday, April 24, when a long programme of vocal and instrumental music, interspersed with recitations, was rendered. Tea was provided by a band of lady workers, under the direction of Mrs. Laura Spill, and a very pleasant evening was spent, the only note of regret being that such meetings are too infrequent amongst us. An interesting feature of the evening's amusement was a gramophone, provided by Mr. G. E. Squires, which delighted the younger members of the company. The congregation is hopeful of a growing prosperity. Recent attacks in the local Press have stimulated inquiry and called out a spirit of fair play. Summer visitors from London and elsewhere will receive a cordial welcome.

ABERYSTWYTH

("The Biarritz of Wales")

Is highly recommended for invalids. It possesses the most equable temperature, its shore being swept by the Gulf Stream and the S.W. breezes of the Atlantic. The drainage is perfect, and the town is supplied with the purest water from Plynlimmon. The late Sir James Clarke, M.P., says: "A fortnight in Aberystwyth is equivalent to a month's residence in most watering places." Guides on application to the Town Clerk.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE reports which appear in our present issue of the annual meetings of the London Domestic Mission Society, the London District Unitarian Society, and the Western Union of Unitarian and Free Christian Churches will, we trust, receive the attention they deserve. We should have been glad to give even more space, had it been possible, to the report of the Domestic Mission meeting, and may find an opportunity next week for some further notes on the missionaries' reports, and Mr. Kirkman Gray's appeal for help in the Boys' Club. This mission work we take to be a crucial test of the value and power of our religious life, and the appeals for further help, both financially and in personal service, cannot be too earnestly pressed upon the attention and the conscience of our community.

THE proceedings in connection with the retirement of Mr. David Martineau from the office of Treasurer of the London District Unitarian Society were memorable for the sincerity and warmth of the feelings expressed on both sides. A report of the words spoken can convey only a very imperfect impression of what took place, and especially of the brave and cheerful spirit in which the veteran relinquished his post of duty, held so long and with such fruitful results, and the simple but heartfelt words in which he acknowledged the expressions of gratitude he had received.

IT will be seen from an advertisement in another column that a proposal is shortly to be made to the Trustees of the Bermondsey Church to dispose of their property, and abandon that field of work. In this connection we ask the attention of our readers to the statement made by Mr. David Martineau at the meeting of the London District Unitarian Society. Is such an opportunity of extended social and religious work really to be lost?

IT is most pleasant to record the spirit of Christian brotherliness which marked the recent meeting of the Western Union at Bridgwater. The kindest hospitality was shown to the visitors by friends of other religious communions, prominent amongst whom were members of the Congregationalist Church and of the Society of Friends. The Congregationalist schoolroom was most kindly placed at the disposal of the Union; the minister, the Rev. J. Hirst, himself attended, and delighted all present by a speech that breathed a spiritual unity, the more welcome from the fact of the speaker's own distinctly avowed Evangelical convictions. At the luncheon grace was said by the Rev. J. Wilson, of the Methodist Free Church, and thanks were returned by the Bible Christian Minister, the Rev. V. H. Culliford. In the deeply-regretted absence of the Mayor of Bridgwater, through severe domestic bereavement, the ex-Mayor, Mr. Alderman T. Good, J.P., a member of the Rev. J. Hirst's congregation, proved a most acceptable president at the luncheon. Such facts are happily significant of the esteem in which our Bridgwater friends, and their minister, the Rev. T. B. Broadrick, are held by their fellow-townsmen.

IN the current number of the Seed Sower, the Editor has a friendly note on the subject of our recent article on "Church Covenants," which summarised a recent special report of the American Unitarian Association. A covenant, the Seed Sower thinks, however it is disguised, must imply a creed, and "our bond of union is not intellectual and theological, but wholly spiritual, and therefore incapable of precise definition." Are we, then, to conclude that a bond of union wholly spiritual cannot be described in simple and intelligible language, in which members of a church might publicly acknowledge the purpose of their union and the foundation principle of their religious society?

THE annual council meeting of the Humanitarian League was held on May 2 at Essex Hall. Mr. Ernest Bell, M.A., presided, and among those who took part in the proceedings were Dr. W. D. Morrison, the Rev. J. Stratton, Mr. J. Frederick Green, Captain Carpenter, R.N., Mrs. Mallet, Miss Edith Ward, Messrs. Collinson, Salt, Baty, and others. It was pointed out in the report that the progress made during the last ten years has been due in a large measure to the League's activities. In moving a resolution, which was unanimously adopted, Dr. Morrison paid a tribute to the valuable work done by the hon. secretary of the Criminal Law and Prison Reform Department of the Humanitarian League, who had been successful in repelling a strong reactionary movement. As an instance Dr. Morrison pointed to the recent announcement by the Home Secretary that the whipping clauses of the Youthful Offenders' Bill are to be omitted when the measure is introduced. There was also the encouraging fact that Mr. Wharton's Flogging Bill had been emphatically rejected owing to Mr. Collinson's work. The resolution was as follows :—

That the Humanitarian League notes with much pleasure the progress made, during the past year, in the humanising of public feeling with regard to the prison system, as shown, on the one hand, in the practical disuse of the treadmill, the modification of prison punishments, and other reforms for which the League has contended, and, on the other hand, in the defeat of all attempts to extend the use of the lash either for adults or for juvenile offenders.

MR. FISHER UNWIN is now the London publisher of the Revue de Paris. This substantial Review, which during the eight years of its existence, has gained a high place in France as a political and literary journal, is published fortnightly, the English price being 2s. net. The number for May 1 opens with Sir Robert Hart's article on "China, Reform, and the Powers," which is also in the current number of the Fortnightly Review. Other subjects treated in the Revue de Paris are "Molière and Farce," "The Religion of Tolstoy," and "Islam." In a recent number there was an interesting article on Tennyson, based on the life of the poet.

IN the May number of Yr Ymofynydd the Editor writes on "Excommunication and Christianity," with reference to Tolstoy; the Rev. W. Tudor Jones, of Swansea, makes an appeal: "Wanted—a new revival," which we should be glad to see in English; the Rev. E. D. Priestley Evans has a second article on "The Gains of the Century"; the Rev. L. Williams writes on "Indifference and Unbelief," and Principal Evans continues (in English) his biographical notes on Carmarthen College.

THE National British Women's Temperance Association is to hold a great meeting in the Queen's Hall on Monday evening next. Lady Henry Somerset, Lord Peel, and Archdeacon Wilberforce are the chief speakers announced.

THE RELIGION OF THE INCARNATION.

SIR,—The discussion on this question in your columns must have been interesting and instructive to those who have been privileged to read it. But apart from the points raised, is there not a great practical human question wider than Trinitarianism or Unitarianism, or any of the academic or theological problems with which we perplex and confuse ourselves?

If there exists a God of supreme Wisdom, Power, and Love, and He is so deeply interested in man, and the welfare of the race of men, that from the remotest ages He has been seeking to raise them, by simple natural evolution, from animalism and barbarism, by imparting to them His Holy Spirit as they were able to receive it, is not the "Incarnation" a great human necessity? And does not Jesus become the practical proof that the qualities of the Supreme can be implanted in, or imparted to, ordinary, simple, commonplace men? Apart from the legends of miracle and wonder which grew around the history of Jesus in the periods of superstition, there appears to be nothing in the common human virtues practised by him different, except in degree and quality, from the virtues of any modern English mechanic; and it might be quite possible in a state of society based on the principles he taught and lived, for a whole community to have the Divine so fully incarnated in the human that the Christ-like virtues would be as natural, or even more so, than our present selfish vices.

Every attempt to make the human Jesus into a God renders him less useful as a guide and help to practical righteousness, but every man who can believe that the Holy Spirit of Wisdom, Power, and Love can so come into his soul as to raise him into the Divine life with Jesus, is in a real sense one of the saviours of the world.

WILLIAM BAYLIS.

Banbury, May 2.

SIR,—The correspondence under this heading is really concerned with two different subjects; there is first the verbal question as to the meaning of the word Incarnation, and, secondly, the far more important question of the place which Jesus occupies in our religion. Dr. Warschauer has been criticised as though he had put forward some entirely new doctrine, invented by himself, which he was trying to pass off under an orthodox disguise. But if anyone is to be blamed for putting new meanings into old expressions, it is the supporters of the "new orthodoxy." We Unitarians have been accustomed to take the orthodox doctrines in their crudest and most objectionable forms, and to reject them utterly; we are prejudiced against the word Incarnation rather than in favour of it. But when the doctrine is presented to us, as it has been during the last fifteen years, in the revised and enlarged form of God in Man—the Incarnation of God in Christ being simply the special instance of a universal truth—then if we wish to be understood we must put aside our Unitarian prejudice against the term, and say that we believe in the Incarnation. Dr. A. P. Peabody said some years ago, "Most Unitarians regard the Incarnation as the central truth of Christianity."

Then, as to the second point, there are, at any rate, some of us who are certainly not Parkerites. Christ holds a permanent and central place in our religion, and a Christless theism would not satisfy our religious needs. To us Jesus Christ is not simply an eminent personage in the past history of the world, not merely a teacher of theism who might or might not have appeared without making much difference, but the Way, the Truth, and the Life.

EDGAR SOLLY ANTHONY.

Poole, May 6.

AN EXPLANATION.

SIR,—I have no cause to complain that Dr. Warschauer thinks it well to close the discussion in which we have been engaged, as it seems impossible for us to come to an understanding. It is evident that we approach the subject from very different points of view. This is clearer than ever, from the fact that he disapproves of the temper in which, he says, I discuss spiritual things. I beg to say, in all sincerity, that had I been discussing spiritual things, my tone would have been very different. But I was only discussing creeds in which I do not believe, and the practice of certain of the clergy with whom I have little sympathy; these are not spiritual things, but merely ecclesiastical.

I yield to no one in the reverence I feel for that which is truly spiritual or divine, either in the Universe or humanity; and for this reason alone I studiously avoided all discussion of it in my letters. I regard it as too sacred for exposure to public controversy, though I am always ready to express my thoughts and feelings with regard to it on suitable occasions.

WALTER LLOYD.

Gloucester, May 7.

DR. WARSCHAUER AND MR. LLOYD.

SIR,—Will you allow me to offer one word of hearty sympathy and respect for Mr. Lloyd, and to express my gratitude to him for his recent contributions to your Correspondence columns. He has, it is true, maintained a position which appears for the moment to be out of fashion amongst us; but I am unable to detect anything in his communications deserving of the rebuke which Dr. Warschauer, in your current issue, administers to him. Mr. Lloyd has for a whole generation served our churches in comparatively inconspicuous situations with singular manliness and devotion, and has brought to bear upon our problems a richly informed mind and, to my thinking, an admirable temper; and I regret to see one to whom we are all much indebted described in the terms which his ardent opponent applies to him. We shall, of course, all read with interest Dr. Warschauer's promised treatise on "The Doctrine of the Incarnation"; but I hope that from Mr. Lloyd also we may have many more of his thoughtful, clear, and earnest letters.

May 7. RICHARD A. ARMSTRONG.

HIS BOW IN THE CLOUD.

LET me abide throughout this gloomy night,
Under a canopy
Of leaden-clouded sky,
But leave me yet the longing for the light
Which cannot fail to come and bless my sight.
Let winter's weary lingering
Not rob me of the hope of spring.

And though I live amongst deceit and lies,
Let me not lose till death
The animating faith
That the white bird of truth some day shall rise
Out of the marsh, and soar towards the skies,
Plain for the human throng to see,
A beauteous thing at liberty.

And even though the wrong should make a hell
Of this fair earth of ours,
Marring its peaceful bowers,
Wherein the sons of men in love should dwell,
Let me not doubt that all at last is well.
Though from this world the good be riven,
To yearn for right shall build my heaven.

For howsoever dark this life may be,
Yet while I long for spring,
And hate the evil thing,
And love the truth, a spark of light I see
Within my soul that claims divinity.
Sorrow and sin are everywhere;
I weep for them, and God is there.

CHRISTIANITY, THE RELIGION OF THE INCARNATION.

I.—EXPOSITORY.

"Thou hast made us unto Thyself, and our heart is restless until it rests in Thee." In this world-famous sentence St. Augustine has stated the whole problem of Religion. Man's ultimate need is to know God, and the superb religious genius of the prophet can find no sublimer description of the golden age to come than in speaking of it as a time when the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord. Such is the goal of all religious striving; we know instinctively that only in union with God can true satisfaction, true happiness, true life be found—that apart from God we have no real existence—that in Him only do we live and move and have our being.

In a dim way man is conscious that what so powerfully, so irresistibly draws him towards God, what makes separation from Him unhappiness, is his own oneness of substance with Him. The attraction is that of like upon like. But while this need is so strong as to carry with it almost a promise of its fulfilment, yet so long as it remains unfulfilled, the sense of unsatisfaction attending it is most painful. This is true at least of the higher stages of human development: while the spiritual nature slumbers, or when it has been drugged, no such unsatisfaction as has just been spoken of, is felt; but as soon as that nature grows conscious of its wants and possibilities, it learns the awful truth that to be without God is also to be without hope in the world.

Overmastering, however, as is man's need of God, access to Him seems to be barred both on the intellectual and on the moral side, or by the facts of our intellectual and moral constitution. Putting the first difficulty very simply, the very fact that God is infinite, makes Him incomprehensible to us; the very fact that He is not to be apprehended by sense, baffles us in our search; the very fact that we are compelled to think under the forms of time and space, renders our thoughts hopelessly inadequate to the conception of One who exists neither in time nor in space, but in whom—if at all—both time and space exist. A sense of this unknowableness of God finds utterance repeatedly in the Bible, and, as we should expect, chiefly in the Old Testament. Passages like the following will occur to everyone: "Canst thou by searching find out God? Canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection? It is high as heaven; what canst thou do? Deeper than Sheol; what canst thou know?" (Job xi. 7, 8). "God is great, and we know him not" (Job xxxvi. 26). "To whom then will ye liken God? Or what likeness will ye compare unto Him?" (Is. xl. 18). "My thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways. For as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are my ways higher than your ways, and my thoughts than your thoughts" (Is. lv. 8, 9). Infinity, omniscience, omnipresence are words which we may use, and by using which we may persuade ourselves that we understand their meaning; but the attributes corresponding to them must of necessity remain inconceivable to us.

Again, on the moral side, it is a fact of universal spiritual experience that the consciousness of sin estranges, alienates, divides us from God, hinders us from having communion with Him. The promise that "the pure in heart shall see God" becomes almost a mockery in the ears of sinful beings, who know that they are not pure in heart; we feel a supreme need—we listen eagerly for the condition upon which it may find satisfaction, only to discover despairingly that it is one we have not fulfilled, and have little hope of ever being able to fulfil.

Now in this knowledge, this open vision of God, this union or at-onement with Him, standeth our eternal, i.e., our spiritual, life—in other words, our salvation; yet by the unalterable facts of our constitution this knowledge, vision, union, seem denied us. In so unsatisfactory a conclusion man cannot rest, but naturally casts about for an escape from the dilemma, for a means of access to God. One great difficulty is overcome by the unavoidable use of anthropomorphism—unavoidable, because the only way in which the finite can represent to itself the Infinite. We are following a simple necessity of our nature when, in legitimate defiance of our theoretical knowledge, we speak, e.g., of the eyes and ears of God; it is better that we should think of Him inadequately than not at all, and the attempt to do away with these forms of speech can only result in making Him an impalpable abstraction, and depriving us of the sense of His reality. Abstract philosophical theism, founded upon teleological and other arguments, lacks vitality and motive power, and tends to evaporate into pantheism or agnosticism. When the finite tries to comprehend the Infinite, when we think that the forms and categories of the understanding are applicable to the Absolute and Unconditioned, we are deluded, and bound to fail.

In this plight we turn in a different direction, and remember our own relation to God, our dim consciousness of our oneness of substance with Him; a relationship, the sense of which is biblically expressed in such phrases as that He created us in His own image, that we are partakers of the divine nature, the temple of the living God. This consciousness with us is a dim and a very intermittent one; yet however much obscured by moral and intellectual infirmity, experience bears witness to it. It is this relation which constitutes the Divine Fatherhood; if we are not merely creatures, but children of God, it is because some portion of His Spirit energises, is immanent or incarnate, in us. But while this indwelling or incarnation of the Holy Spirit is a universal fact, entitling us to speak of the divinity of man, there are differences of degree. The same Spirit dwells in all, but not in equal measure. In all men there is a struggle being waged for predominance between self, with its passions and appetites, and God; the divine and earthly elements of which we are compounded, are ever at variance in us—too much so to permit us to derive from our own experience the full assurance of our essential oneness with God.

Even a feeble and flickering light, however, is better than none, and in the present case such light as is given us by our own spiritual experience suffices at any rate to suggest a way towards fuller clearness, a way in which the blessed and saving thought of the indestructible union between God and man may be brought home to ordinary humanity. We repea that in most men the sense of this union is strictly sub-conscious, at best only realised in momentary flashes, with long and dreary intervals between; for them, the consciousness of sin obscures that sense, slackens the bond, and thus, without breaking it, makes its existence seem less real. What was needed was a supreme object-lesson to show to the world that a man, one of themselves, could reach such a level of spiritual exaltation as to be able to say, or to make others feel, that he and his Father were one, able to bid his brethren be of good cheer, inasmuch as he had overcome the world—i.e., sin,—and that what one man had done, all men might do. That object-lesson was afforded to mankind in Jesus Christ. In him the spiritual or divine element absolutely overcame the earthly, prevailing over all impure admixture. A man so entirely filled with the Holy Spirit, to the exclusion of all baser matter, would be rightly described as Divine, though not as God—God being infinite; and, while all men are children of God, this one would have a pre-eminent right to the title of the Son, on account of his perfect resemblance to the Father. In Christ the Incarnation, which is a universal fact, reached its highest degree. Precisely because he was man in the truest sense, he demonstrated in his own person victoriously the Divine Immanence, that unity of God and man, the assurance of which is what all the world seeks after. "In Christ alone is the reconciliation perfect between the human and the Divine. But the same two natures meet in us all; and he is but the exemplar of a perpetual incarnation, of a living and constant union with our humanity."—(Martineau.) "In Christ, man's essential unity with the divine nature is made evident, and can never again be called in question."—(Wilson.) The famous Athanasian dictum, "God was made man that we might become gods," is only the paradoxical presentation of the thought that God revealed His indwelling in one man so indubitably that henceforth all men might be convinced of His indwelling in them, indisputably. In the life of Christ, with its grandeur and simplicity, the deep spiritual fact of actual human communion with God was proved to be true. "Christ has by his own existence explained the relation of man to God. It is that of union, not of separation."—(Wilson.)

But more than this. Our intellectual difficulty in conceiving of the Infinite God is overcome, so far as it can be overcome, by the fact that in Christ God was "personally there, giving expression to His spiritual nature." —(Martineau.) The infinitude of God had rendered Him incomprehensible to us; but in Christ we see the divine nature manifested on a finite scale—i.e., the only scale on which we can understand it. For "Godlike qualities, being simply intense in beauty and not mathematically large, can glow within the human limits as clearly as in the scale of infinitude. If there is to be any expression of the Divine character at all, it can only be through the lineaments of an individual soul, passing through a concrete and particular life."—(Martineau.) "It is as the type of God, the human image of the Everlasting Mind, that Christ becomes an object of our faith. The peculiar office of Jesus is to show us, not to tell us, the spirit of that Being who spreads around us in Infinitude and leads us through Eternity. The Universe had prepared us for the scale of Deity, Christ has filled it with his own spirit; and we worship now, not the cold intellectual Deity of natural religion, but One whose likeness is seen in Jesus of Nazareth. . . . Christ possessed and manifested all the moral attributes of Deity. . . . These we conceive to have been compressed in Christ within the physical and intellectual limits of humanity."—(Martineau.) Therefore Christ in a unique degree makes God known to us—he that hath seen him hath seen the Father—or, God compassionating our infirmity of understanding, and as a concession to our weakness, makes Himself known to us in Christ. "Whom else could he send to show us the approaches to Himself?"—(Martineau.)

Our intellectual difficulty in conceiving of God may be stated, and the manner in which that difficulty is overcome in Christ shown, in yet another way. God is hidden from us by the very fulness of His being; we are blinded by the excess of His light, just as we are unable to gaze into the sun at noon-day. Into a reflection of the sun we might, however, be able to gaze; and similarly, the infinite God whom we are otherwise unable to behold, is most clearly manifested to us in that one of His children whom the writer of Hebrews happily called "the very image of His substance." Pre-Christian and non-Christian revelations of God are neither denied nor ignored; but they are on a lower level, and "when that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part shall be done away."

We therefore come to the Father through the Son—not exclusively, but best in that way; in other words, Personality being the highest fact known to us, that of God is best apprehended as revealed in the ideal human personality, in the ideal representative of the race. This entitles us to speak of Christ as the Mediator, because he gives us the fullest revelation of the Godhead of which we can conceive. "Such a one stands openly between our thought and God. . . Such a mediatorial mind . . . becomes to us an objective revelation, scattering our doubts of God."—(Martineau.) In the same way, we said that Christ was the At-one-ment, by showing us the unity of God and man in his own person. We, by sin, feel divided from God—he, by overcoming sin, is himself made one with God, and so breaks down the middle wall of partition, because he holds out to us the assurance of the same consummation being attainable by us. He simply realised the potentialities of humanity to the fullest; that which is possible for us all—rather, what we were created for—viz., union with God—in his case became actual.

Christianity, then, as a religion, is not "a law of commandments contained in ordinances," not merely an ethical or spiritual code; its distinctive feature is this, that it centres in, and is founded upon, a Personality. Christ "taught a religion by being a Religion. He is himself the glorious gospel of the blessed God."—(Thom.) Christianity is essentially the religion of the unity of God and man, typified in Christ, the august symbol of the deepest spiritual truth—himself truly divine, because truly human; it is the Religion of the Incarnation.

THE REV. S. M. CROTHERS, D.D.

AN American friend sends us, at our request, the following sketch of the Rev. S. M. Crothers, D.D., of Cambridge, Mass., who has been designated as one of the delegates from the American Unitarian Association to the Twentieth Century and International Meetings in Whit-week.

The Rev. Samuel McChord Crothers was born in the State of Illinois in 1857. His name, and certain intellectual traits, would seem to indicate a descent from that Scotch-Irish stock which has made such notable contributions to the material and moral welfare of English-speaking peoples. He graduated at Princeton College in 1874. Reared in the Presbyterian and Calvinistic faith, young Crothers followed his native bent and entered Union Theological Seminary in New York City, the principal divinity school of that important denomination in the United States. But Union Seminary, while under Presbyterian auspices, has always been distinguished for its high standards of intellectual culture, the ability of its professors, and a certain independence of denominational control, which in late years have produced such notable representatives of liberal orthodoxy as Professors C. A. Briggs and A. C. McGiffert.

Ordained as a Presbyterian minister in 1877, Mr. Crothers carried with him into his chosen profession the illuminating and broadening experiences of these years of preparation at the seminary, an influence which accorded well with his own transparent sincerity of nature and the originality and independence of his mental habit.

These tendencies toward a more liberal interpretation of Christian truth were greatly strengthened by five years of pioneer and missionary service which he now undertook in the Far West. In heterogeneous and turbulent mining communities in Nevada, where the traditions and restraints of older civilisations were almost totally lacking, and in the strange mingling of Anglo-Saxon and Spanish-American elements in Southern California, the young preacher found his sympathies humanised and his theological opinions undergoing a radical change. The unconventionality and practical exigencies of social life under these new and chaotic conditions liberalised and broadened his mind, and made him long for a religious philosophy in which human nature is not viewed through the haze of mediæval speculations, but estimated at its actual worth, and in relation to its daily needs.

He happily met at this time the Rev. Francis Greenwood Peabody, now Professor of Ethics at Harvard University, who acquainted him more fully with the writings of Channing, Parker, and Martineau.

His changed opinions soon led him to withdraw from the Presbyterian body, and unite with the Unitarian fellowship. Returning to the East, he became pastor of a Unitarian congregation at Brattleboro', Vermont, a lovely mountain town and summer resort, for some years the home also of Rudyard Kipling.

But the missionary spirit for which he is noted led him, despite his love of culture and intellectual pursuits, to undertake the charge of the young and struggling Unitarian Society in St. Paul, the twin-metropolis, with Minneapolis, of the virgin State of Minnesota. Here, as successor to William C. Gannett and others, he rendered admirable service. His powers as a thinker, and a preacher of rational and spiritual Christianity, rapidly matured. This became so apparent that his appearance and word in pulpit and on the platform were much in demand, both at the East and West. Tempting offers of influential pulpits were made him. Among others, the Arlington-street Church, Boston, to which Dr. Channing had ministered, and where more recently Dr. Brooke Herford and Rev. John Cuckson rendered notable service, gave him a unanimous and urgent invitation to become their pastor. With characteristic unselfishness Mr. Crothers declined this and other opportunities, from a sense of duty remaining with his struggling Western parish, and foregoing the trebled salary and manifold intellectual and social advantages of a Boston ministry.

In 1894, however, he yielded to the insistence of personal friends and the denominational authorities and accepted charge of the First Parish in Cambridge, Mass. This church has been long and honourably identified with the history and growth of Harvard University, whose Annual Commencements, until comparatively recent years, were held within its walls. Its membership consists largely of college elements, President Eliot and many of the leading professors and their families, as well as student youth attending worship there. No greater contrast can be imagined than that afforded by Mr. Crothers' early missionary experiences in the Far West and his present pastorate over one of the most intellectual and high-caste societies of New England. But here, as there, his success, both as a preacher and an intellectual and ethical influence in the community, has been marked, and gratifying to his parishioners and friends. His sermons, delivered entirely without notes, are distinguished for their brevity and condensation, their originality and freshness, their simplicity and directness, their rich literary allusion, and a spiritual quality which defies analysis but adds the last grace and effectiveness to a minister's discourse. The extremely youthful and frail appearance of the speaker, and a certain aloofness of manner, make his power over his audiences due to no mere physical or personal impression, but to the transparent purity of his character, the freshness and loftiness of his thought, and his appeal to the nobler sentiments of his hearers.

The congregations which gather to hear Mr. Crothers are large and deeply appreciative. He is often heard also in the college chapel, and is one of the chaplains at the Radcliffe (Woman's) Annex to the University. A few years since Harvard conferred on him the honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity. He has served on various Committees of the Unitarian denomination, as director of the American Unitarian Association and the Western Unitarian Conference, and on the Editorial Board of the Christian Register. His missionary ardour still carries him every year to the scattered and lonely churches of the Far West.

Mr. Crothers is much sought after as an occasional speaker, his unusual powers of wit and humour making him especially popular at social and literary gatherings.

More recently he has entered the literary field, and a number of brilliant and genial essays in the Atlantic and other periodicals give rich promise for the future.

This will be Mr. Crothers' first visit to Europe. Accompanied by his cultivated and amiable wife, he purposes spending some months in England and the Continent, penetrating as far South as Florence. By his character and ability, his station and service, he is an admirable representative of American Unitarianism of the modern inclusive and progressive type. We, who are associated with him in denominational and public labours in the United States, are confident that he will, through this sojourn, add to the universal regard and affection entertained for him here the appreciation and goodwill of his European brethren.

THE WHIT-WEEK MEETINGS.

SIR,—Will you again kindly allow me to call attention to some matters of interest relating to the Whitsuntide Meetings?

(1.) It is important that friends who desire rooms, &c., to be obtained for them at boarding-houses or hotels, should make application at once, as the available accommodation is being rapidly taken up.

(2.) There are still vacancies in the United Choir for the Service at St. James's Hall, and these we should be glad to fill up.

(3.) On the Friday evening Sir John and Lady Brunner, as well as Sir Edwin and Lady Durning-Lawrence, very kindly invite a portion of the visitors to a reception. Invitations will be issued in due course, as well as for the Lord Mayor's Reception on the afternoon of the same day. The Lord Mayor's hospitable desires are great while his accommodation at the Mansion House is limited: and it will, I fear, be impossible to include very many beyond the delegates and ministers, as the number is limited to 600. Friends receiving an invitation to any of the receptions, which they are unable to accept, are urgently requested to communicate their inability to Mr. Bowie at the earliest possible day. By doing so they will not merely facilitate the arrangements of the Committee, but also enable a larger number of friends to enjoy the hospitality so kindly provided. Invitations and complimentary tickets will be issued to ministers and delegates next week.

(4.) We shall be much obliged to any London friends who can still offer to receive ministers in their homes during the meetings. Upwards of 200 ministers have already intimated their intention of being present.

(5.) Some concern has been expressed as to the number and variety of the papers set down for the Friday. I may therefore say that a modification has been made (to be presently announced) by which the proceedings will be more evenly distributed between the Thursday and Friday.

While writing, may I refer to the close of your Manchester Correspondent's letter last week? More in sorrow than anger Mr. Roper says that "our southern friends" in fixing the meetings for Whit-week, do not sufficiently appreciate the case of the teachers in his district. I fully sympathise with Mr. Roper's regret, for I myself had the privilege of belonging to the Manchester District. But it is important, and only fair, to remember that the B. and F.U.A., and the Sunday-school Association, which make the arrangements for these meetings, are not composed of "Southern friends" alone. In the geographical, as well as in other senses, I venture to claim that the Associations are inclusive and representative, and try to keep "the even keel." As a matter of fact a ballot was taken some years ago as to the best time for holding the annual meetings, with the result in favour of Whitsuntide. Of course the members can change the time if they wish. Meanwhile, I rejoice to find from the list already to hand that the Manchester District is to be well represented at the forthcoming meetings, though doubtless some whom we should have been glad to welcome will be kept away by duties nearer home. JAMES HARWOOD.

Chairman of the General Arrangements Committee.

IRISH CONTINGENT.

SIR,—The agent of Fleetwood Steamers suggests to me I should advise visitors to London by either the excursion from Belfast on the 24th inst., or by the single fare and quarter ticket arrangement (25th or 27th), that to secure berths they should be written for well-ahead—eleven days, or longer if possible, prior to date of travel. Address, "Fleetwood Steamers, 20, Donegall Quay, Belfast." No money need be paid until the evening of the departure of the steamer.

IN THE ACADEMY.

THERE are no monstrosities of mere size in this year's Academy, but neither, so far as we have seen, is there any glimmering of a new and better day for British Art. Among our younger poets we are led now and again by some new work to the wistful hope that here, perhaps, is at last a voice that will be heard, here are tones of strong uplifting passion, with the commanding power of beauty, promising once more a great singer; but among our artists who is there that stirs any such hope?

The picture in this exhibition that will attract the greatest interest it undoubtedly the central portrait of our late Queen, by M. Benjamin Constant, of Paris. With its surrounding drapery it fitly occupies the whole of one end of the chief gallery, and by its tone suggests that its natural place would be in a panel of a great oak room. The picture is not in the strict sense of the term a portrait, but a work of imagination taken from a portrait. It was painted in 1899, and attracted much attention in the Paris Exhibition last year. In the May number of Harper it is reproduced as frontispiece to an article by M. Constant on his portraits, in which he tells how his great picture was produced. He had no sitting from the Queen, but from his remembrance of the throne in the House of Lords, touched by the slanting rays of the autumn sunshine, he built up the ideal, which he hoped to work out in his picture.

The Sovereign, seated on the Throne of England, motionless, her gaze deep in retrospection, almost hieratic—the idol of her subjects. I saw this Queen in gorgeous robes covered with jewels, and bathed in the rays of the setting sun from head to foot. With this sublime apparition in my mind, I wished to express, as it were, an entire reign.

Careful studies in the House of Lords followed, and then with the help of a small but exact portrait of the Queen, the picture was completed in Paris, "a resemblance rather moral than physical, almost a historical vision."

A kindred interest will be found in Mr. Charlton's picture of the Funeral Procession of the Queen, passing St. James's Palace (253), and Mr. Wyllie's "Passing of a Great Queen" (272), a fine picture of the naval pageant.

There are a good many other pictures of human interest, but none that carry one away. The girl's face in Mr. H. G. Riviere's "Garden of Eden" (427) is one of the pleasantest things in the exhibition, and in "The First Commission" (314), by Miss Dicksee, the little lad is delightful.

In Briton Riviere's "To the Hills" (179) it is a true shepherd that is starting out with his dogs. Mr. Seymour Lucas has a picture of Wolsey before his fall (300) in the trim Tudor garden, which is of great interest. Goodall has painted the sphinx impressively (477), and Alma-Tadema's white marble and "blue Ionian weather" (220) are, if possible, more exquisite than ever. MacWhirter revives an old delight in his "Flowery Path" (99), but not quite equal to the old, while his New and Old Edinburgh (333 and 341) are in quite a different field. Leader has been on the South Coast, and contributes several rather chilly pictures, but his "Weald of Surrey" (810) is more welcome, and should make a very popular engraving. There is an abundance of portraits, in two of which we find a special interest—Sargent's "C. S. Loch" (576), painted to commemorate his twenty-five years of service as secretary of the C.O.S., and Mrs. Basil Martineau's "Arthur Paterson" (608), though this, unfortunately, is nearly out of sight. Mr. Dendy Sadler contributes two quaint and skilful pictures (570 and 806). Mr. Savage Cooper has painted "London, from Parliament Hill" (235). Many of our readers will look with special interest for the pictures of Miss L. Fisher, Mr. G. Wetherbee, T. B. Wirgman, and Miss Frances Drummond, whose "Library, Merton College, Oxford" (1157) is among the water-colours.

The sculpture seems to us to reach a higher level this year than the painting, notably Hamo Thornycroft's "Dean Colet" (1708) and Pomeroy's "Oliver Cromwell" (1700). Onslow Ford's huge statue of the enthroned Queen can hardly be judged in its present position. Mr. H. R. Hope-Pinker exhibits a very fine bust of "Sir Joseph Prestwich" (1786), executed for the University Museum, Oxford, and also his memorial tablet of the late John James Tayler (1724) to be placed in the Manchester College Chapel, at Oxford.

COUNTRY HOLIDAY MOVEMENT.—Miss A. Lawrence, 23, Campden House-chambers, Campden-hill, London, W., begs to acknowledge, with many thanks, receipt for this fund of the following sums:—Mrs. Rooke, £1; Mr. F. S. Schwann, £1; B. X., £2; Mr. Charles Jecks, £1; Dr. Harris, £1 1s.; Mr. Plumptre, £1 1s.; Miss Wood, 10s. 6d.; and a parcel of clothing.

A RELIGIOUS BIOGRAPHY.

WILLIAM WATSON ANDREWS, who was born in 1810, and died in 1897, was an American Congregational minister who, at the age of thirty-nine, joined the Catholic Apostolic Church (mistakenly called "Irvingite," by those who do not know its true history), and as one of her ministers laboured devotedly until the end. For those outside the particular religious surroundings in which he made his home—and most people are outside them, for the number of members of the Catholic Apostolic Church remains very small—the chief interest and pathos of his life lies in the simplicity and earnestness with which he followed truth as he understood it, and the scanty success which attended his evangelistic labours.

We note the pathos in a good man's hard work and small success. We read: "The experience of Mr. Andrews as an evangelist showed him very early that the number of those having an ear to his message was small. . . . His experience wherever he went was very uniform—at first an audience sometimes large, then gradually diminishing as his subject was more fully opened and its high claims presented, till the final result showed scarce one in a hundred who accepted his message. But he was not discouraged, nor led to make that message more acceptable by lowering its claims, and keeping out of sight its more objectionable features; for he was not responsible for its reception. He believed that the seed of truth he was sowing, however long buried, would spring up and bear fruit in God's good time." A similar faith has happily sustained many another preacher of an unpopular gospel.

It is scarcely necessary here to discuss the origin and the claims of the Catholic Apostolic Church. But that in William Watson Andrews it had a noble-minded and large-hearted exponent none who read his life will deny. His biographer says how natural it would have been if, hearing his good almost everywhere evil spoken of, and knowing that many of his own friends looked upon his life as almost wasted, his spirit had taken a tinge of bitterness, and a feeling of antagonism had been aroused which would find expression in censorious and denunciatory words.

But, however he may have felt the want of appreciation and sympathy, no denunciatory or bitter word ever passed his lips. Whilst he would not call evil good or good evil, and was outspoken in his affirmation of the truths he believed, he impugned no man's honesty; he imputed no evil motive. He always sought to find points of unity with his brethren, and no words of coldness or repulsion on their part made him treat them in other than a loving and brotherly spirit.

Anti-sectarianism is, indeed, an essential and valuable part of the message of the Catholic Apostolic Church to the world. To quote his biographer again:—

> It was inevitable that the sectarian, zealously labouring for the advancement of his sect, forgetful that every part shares the strength or weakness of the whole, should find Mr. Andrews' teaching as to Church unity vague and unpractical, and should measure success by the number he had gathered into his own corner of the great fold, and his ability to keep them separated from their brethren around them.

In which words there is pondering material for a good many Christians.

When Andrews had thrown in his lot with the Catholic Apostolic Church, it was natural that the defects of the Congregational polity in which he had been reared should be very plain to him. He writes—and it is almost the only touch of humour in this serious book:—"What can be more negative than Congregationalism when it assumes the type of Independency? I protest I can make neither head nor tail of it. All is head, and there is no tail, unless it be the poor minister." In which words, again, there is matter for reflection.

Andrews was a man of considerable intellectual and literary gifts. It is a strong and kindly face that we see in the frontispiece. Friends, old and new, honoured and loved him, even though so few of them could accept his gospel. And the work of such a man is not done in vain.

OBITUARY.

MRS. LUCCOCK.

THE death of Mrs. Luccock is a loss, not only to Mill Hill Chapel, but to the City of Leeds. She was a subscriber to all the unsectarian charities of the town, and an active worker in many, especially in such as concerned the interests of women and girls. She took a leading part in all congregational activities, from a time further back than we can find record of, and she followed the example set by her husband in giving liberal support to our various institutions.

The position she occupied afforded her influence, and leisure, and means, and she made full use of them for the benefit of her own church and her poorer sisters of every creed. Her husband, who died in 1884, was for forty-two years an Alderman of the Borough of Leeds, and one of the most influential, liberal, and consistent members of the congregation. He was twice chosen Mayor of the town, and her father, Francis Carbutt, and her brother, the present Sir Edward Carbutt, also held the same honourable office. So that she was wife, daughter, and sister to Mayors of Leeds, nor could any woman have been found more worthy of the honour reflected upon her by the choice of her kinsfolk for preferment. She was plain spoken almost to a fault, and absolutely incapable of pretty speeches or compliments. She had been brought up in the somewhat stern fashion of the old Unitarianism, which was so near akin to the older Puritanism, and could with difficulty reconcile herself to the easy-going pleasure-loving ways of the present day. But under a sometimes ungentle manner she hid a true and tender heart, as very many had occasion to know who were indebted to her for all manner of kindnesses.

She held many offices in various societies, Unitarian and philanthropic, and in all she performed the duties she undertook with regularity, and exactness, and real interest. She was secretary and treasurer of our day-schools for forty years; teacher, and afterwards afternoon superintendent of the girls Sunday-school; and treasurer for the Holbeck Domestic Mission at the time of her death. Her services were much sought after as honorary treasurer, for she had all the rare qualifications, the accuracy in accounts, the authority, and influence, required for that office. The Industrial School for Girls was much indebted to her as treasurer, and she held the same post for the West Riding Ladies' Club. She was the first president of the Leeds Women's Liberal Association. For twenty years she was an active member of the Ladies' Committee of the Leeds Charity Organisation Society, and as honorary superintendent of needle-work, discharged duties which were common-place and fatiguing, without intermission, till the sense of increasing infirmity led to her resignation last year. She was a supporter of the higher education of women, before it was generally approved as it is now, and a member of the Leeds Ladies' Educational Association, and probably of all Leeds societies for the amelioration of women's lot. But, perhaps, none will miss her so much as will the Female Benefit Society, of which she was practically the manager. There is no need to make further search of all she did and helped to do. "To whom much is given, of him shall be much required," said Jesus. She had very many advantages in life: and her fellow citizens can bear her testimony that she made good use of them for the benefit of all.

The funeral service was held in Mill Hill Chapel, at noon, on May 3, and the body was afterwards conveyed to Manchester for cremation. The urn containing the ashes was brought back to Leeds, and laid for the night in the place where she had worshipped for sixty years, to be deposited the next morning in her husband's grave at Lawnswood Cemetery.

In her we of Mill Hill lose one more of the few remaining survivors of that sturdy generation to whom we owe our place of worship and all the advantages of our reputation in Leeds.

C. H.

JOHN TROUP.

THE Hackney congregation has just lost its oldest member in the person of Mr. John Troup, of Upper Clapton, who passed away on May 1, in the ninety-third year of his age. For fifty years a member of the New Gravel Pit Church, during a considerable part of that time an active member of its committee, and always a generous supporter of its institutions, he acted as its treasurer during portions of the ministries both of the Rev. R. Brook Aspland and the Rev. J. T. Whitehead. For a number of years he served on the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and was a member of the Council up to the time of his death. Of late years Mr. Troup, owing to his increasing deafness, had been hindered from taking any part in the management of the many Unitarian societies in which he was deeply interested, and his genial face was perhaps better known to a former generation of our friends than to the present; but his sympathies were always alive to the necessities of our more struggling churches, and to the end he was a very staunch adherent of Liberal thought in all forms, religious and political. His ripe experience and sound judgment were at the service of all who came to him; one never left his company without feeling invigorated by his ever-youthful hopefulness. Life to him was always thoroughly worth living. His interest in political affairs and in all questions of social and municipal life was active to the last; only last March he insisted on recording his vote for the London County Council, although at considerable personal inconvenience, and his satisfaction at hearing that his candidates had been triumphantly returned was delightedly expressed.

Mr. Troup was born of Calvinist parents at Welwyn, Herts, in 1808. At an early age he took over the business of his cousin Mr. James Troup, a wholesale jeweller and diamond merchant, which through his practical ability, industry, and uprightness became well known throughout the trade. In all his business dealings he earned universal trust and respect, not only by his knowledge and energy, but by his high integrity and straightforwardness. By his death we have lost an honoured friend who was an example of unostentatious goodness in all his relations, and who reflected credit upon the denomination with which he was so long connected by his intelligent appreciation of its principles, and his munificent support of its institutions.

Mr. Troup married, in 1834, Miss Igglesden, a member of an old General Baptist (Unitarian) family, and leaves two sons and three daughters to lament his loss. His eldest son failed in health while comparatively young after many years' military service abroad, retired early with the rank of Assistant-Commissary-General, and died in 1898. His second daughter is the widow of Dr. Lindsey Aspland, Q.C., whose death in the prime of his life and the height of his reputation, in 1891, was one of the greatest griefs of our late friend's life.

As to his home-life those who knew him best could best appreciate his constant cheerfulness and philosophy, his active and self-helpful ways, his genial pleasure in seeing his friends, his affection for his children, and his general inculcation of "the gospel of happiness." He wished that all around him might be happy and did his best to make them so. And in this connection we may quote the words of a friend's letter :—" It is good to have known him. I think I never met him in your home at Clapton without going away afterwards with renewed admiration for his patience and cheerfulness. . . . He was something of a hero in my eyes, for his deafness must have been to anyone so sociable as he was, a very sore affliction."

He preserved a wonderful youthfulness to the last; there were none of the symptoms of old age about him, and, with the exception of his hearing, he retained all his faculties up to within a few weeks of his decease.

The funeral service was conducted on Saturday afternoon last by the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor, B.A., at the New Gravel Pit Church, Hackney. At the close of a simple and appropriate address, the anthem "O may I join the choir invisible" was beautifully rendered by some professional friends, the music being that of Mr. Troup's youngest daughter. The interment was at Kensal Green Cemetery.

Another friend of Mr. Troup's latter years sends us the following tribute :—

"A grand old man, at a time when most men lose their hold upon life, his faculties were clear, and his geniality, his simplicity, his wonderful freshness, made his old age perfectly beautiful. The sympathy of all who knew him will go out to those who have lost one whom but to know was to love, whose bright, hopeful presence was a stimulus to the best kind of liberalism.

"Of him, too, we may say, as Isaac Walton said of another, 'This good man was a dear lover and constant practiser of angling as any age can produce,' for he was a keen fisherman, and all those amiable qualities that Walton enumerates as belonging to the angler did certainly meet here. 'More pleasant and more suitable than harsh discourse' to his memory are some verses from the fisherman's book of books :—

The lofty woods, the forests wide and long,
Adorned with leaves and branches fresh and green,
In whose cool bowers the birds, with many a song,
Do welcome with their quire the summer's queen;
The meadows fair, where Flora's gifts among
Are intermix'd, with verdant grass between;
The silver-scaled fish that softly swim
Within the sweet brook's crystal, watery stream:

All these, and many more of His creation
That made the heavens, the angler oft doth see;
Taking therein no little delectation,
To think how strange, how wonderful they be;
Framing thereof an inward contemplation
To set his heart from other fancies free;
And whilst he looks on these with joyful eye,
His mind is rapt above the starry sky."

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

WHEN I was a girl we went to a chapel where the minister read prayers from a book of Ten Services. As we followed his voice every Sunday from our own Prayer-books, we learnt the words by heart, and knew without looking when strange ministers changed the prayers a wee bit. There was one sentence which they never altered, and which I have remembered ever since, because it was one I loved, and partly understood among a good deal a child could not understand in those old Ten Services. It often comes to me with the ring of our minister's voice in it, now I am grown-up and need more and more to feel its meaning.

"God in whom we live, and move, and have our being, never leaves us day or night." Say it over several times. It is the text of "The Children's Column" this week.

God "never leaves us" by helping us with good parents, teachers, friends and playmates, and often with the animals we love to have about our homes. He shows Himself in this glorious Spring-time, in the young leaves and grass, and budding flowers, and in the busy stir of bird and insect. But what I specially want you to think about is that God is always in your hearts even when people, places, and other things change, or do not seem best for us.

This is what Christ lived and died to show the world. Though he thought it was well to say prayers at fixed times, and taught his disciples that beautiful one beginning, "Our Father who art in Heaven," yet he was always showing that just as good earthly parents and children live in and for each other, so people may feel one with God, that is filled with His Spirit, making a heaven of love and goodness, at work and play, any time and anywhere. He must have thought that in some ways God was nearer to young folks than their elders, for he said about some children, "Of such is the Kingdom of Heaven," and once told some grown-up people that if they would enter the Kingdom of Heaven they must become "as little children."

Yes, but what sort of children? Slovenly, untruthful, cowardly, selfish, irreverent? Of course you will say, "Just the opposite kind." I asked you to try the plan of thinking only of the good habits. You will forget the bad ones if you also remember that God "never leaves us" in our efforts to be good and do our duty. We cannot always be conscious of His Presence, but nothing in our lives is too small for Him to share in. He knows the special difficulties of each of you children, and will help you out of them if you let Him. Think of God when you feel inclined to shirk home-duties, leave dust in corners, and put blacking on dirty boots, or when you want to peep at your neighbour's sum in class. Take courage from God when bearing pain, or dreading an "exam.," or leaving home for the first time. Use His strength against the temptation to be conceited, or selfish, or to shift the blame for wrong-doing off yourself.

Lastly, feel God with you by being thankful and light-hearted, and extra good after a jolly game, or a holiday, or any other happiness. "God is never weary of doing you good," said cheerful Oliver Cromwell; so though this tender Heavenly Father grieves when you are thoughtless and irreverent in church, or Band of Hope, and at other times when you ought to be serious, He loves to share all healthy, innocent pleasure in its right place.

In the square of Spinalunga the children used to play in front of the Cathedral, and from the niche above the great west door a statue of the Madonna and Babe smiled down. The sight of the merry playmates was frequently the only pleasure of the anxious elders who lived in troublous times. But there was once a grim old mayor of the town, whose house stood near the square. He was plagued with gout, and the youngsters' noise so irritated him that he forbade them to play beyond their dull, narrow alleys. Their beautiful playground became strangely silent. Nor was the mayor any better off. He was now angry with the stillness, and with the feeling of discontent in the town. Soon a wise and kindly hermit heard of the trouble, and came to the mayor. "Your pain," said he, "has made you selfish. The children would gladly give up their play if it would ease you. Were it not better to seek to distract yourself with their sports? Watch them, and you shall see that which shall delight you so much that you will ever more wish to have their company."

And when the children played again in the square, what do you think the old mayor saw? With each child was his angel clothed in white, and white winged, and as the little folks frolicked, so frolicked the angels; and which was the laughter of the children, and which that of the angels the mayor and hermit could not tell. The legend says, too, that at the sight of the joyous games of the young angels and bright-eyed children, the marble Babe above the Cathedral doorway laughed aloud and clapped his hands. Then in a moment the Babe was once more stone, and it was only the children the two old men saw. The angels were no longer visible. "But," said the hermit, "whether we see them or not, always they are there."

THE EDUCATION PROBLEM.

To most of those who will read these lines nothing is clearer than the imperative need of educating the nation's children and young people. To-day, as of old, the people are destroyed for lack of knowledge. It is a common-place of modern political oratory that our nation must either educate its workmen more fully or drop behind in the world's race for commercial success. Without being oblivious to the worth of that argument, our view of the problem, and that of our readers, we hope, is a different one. Man shall not live by bread alone, nor nations by markets alone. Ultimately the nation's well-being rests on that of its individual citizens; and it cannot be well with any man if his faculties are suffered to remain undeveloped or to struggle only into a maimed and perverted life.

Unitarians and their closer religious kin have never failed to recognise the necessity for mental culture and discipline. They may sometimes have forgotten that the intellect is not the whole man; but their zeal for enlightenment, even if it were as keen as their severest critics say, is not in itself a fault. If we aim at no one-sided culture, we may say that the practical side of our religious life is substantially nothing other than educating and being educated. We have our differences in other matters, but here we are one. Our political sympathies are extremely various, and it would not be safe to assert that any of the many political parties now existing is without its adherents amongst us. But in this thing we agree, whether we are Unionists or Home-rulers, Imperialists, or "Little Englanders"—we all regard stupidity as a deplorable thing, a most prolific source not only of material loss but of social vexation and disturbance, of personal disease, and of ruinous vice. It was said by SCHILLER that against stupidity even the gods are powerless, and every fresh campaign against the stupid confirms the adage. But education is, or ought to be, in the field before stupidity has arisen; and what we aim at is not so much to recover minds from bondage as to preserve free-born minds in healthful vigour and ever-increasing efficiency.

With such feelings, we cannot regard lightly a crisis like that which has just been reached in the political history of educational affairs. The problem of how best to secure a really creditable national scheme of education for all our children and young people, not only for the poor but for every class, is one of great complexity. The Government which has just introduced a new Bill dealing with the subject is practically the same as that which a few years ago came to hopeless grief in a similar venture. It has been said these many months that a new scheme would be brought forward; but it is obvious that the present Bill owes its immediate place in the business of Parliament to accident rather than design. Although some of the dominant party rejoiced greatly in the success of the official auditor, Mr. COCKERTON, who has disallowed expenses incurred in giving certain forms of instruction in Board Schools, we may safely conjecture that the shrewdest members of the Government could have well dispensed with the necessity of taking action just now. As we have said, the subject is a difficult one, and —"once bitten, twice shy." But when London, Liverpool, and Manchester, and other centres of Board School activity showed so unmistakably as they did that disaster was inevitable unless something were done, and done quickly, there was no longer room for hesitation. The provisions of Sir JOHN GORST's Bill have been adapted to cover the exigencies of the case, and thus, more by compulsion than by deliberate intention, the Government is a second time involved in a troublesome, not to say politically perilous controversy.

It is, of course, impossible for us, if on any ground it were desirable, to enter here upon a discussion of the details of the Bill. But as far as can be seen of its principles in the light of Tuesday's speech, Sir JOHN GORST's measure aims distinctly at lessening the power of the School Boards; it seems to complicate our educational machinery instead of simplifying it; and it hands over the secondary education of the scholars to bodies which, apart from members to be co-opted specially, will certainly have plenty to do without assuming wide educational duties. It appears certain that an attempt will be made, if not by the Government, certainly by some of its friends, to give voluntary schools assistance from the rates, notwithstanding the absence of control by the public who pay those rates. This is, substantially, to make a new "church rate," for we know by bitter experience that the principle guiding the managers of these so-called "voluntary" schools is that no teacher who is a Dissenter—and a fortiori, no Unitarian—need apply. Finally, it is evident that the Government have dexterously tacked on to their Bill the provisions for relieving the stress caused by the COCKERTON judgment, and they can now bid their critics take all or none. If the Opposition wants the higher education and the adult evening classes to continue, let them pass the Bill; if they will not pass the Bill neither shall they have the relief desired. It is a pretty piece of politics, but it is not admirable from any other point of view, least of all from that of the citizen who cares more for the true honour and welfare of his country than for all the Cabinets that ever were. Let us hope that such citizens will make their voice heard both in Parliament and outside, and so effectually as to prevent the mischiefs which the Bill at present seems to contemplate.

What can individuals or local societies amongst ourselves do to affect these grave issues and sway the ultimate decision in the right direction? Two things they can do at once. First, they can write to members of Parliament—of course remembering those who may be expected to take the liveliest interest in this subject, no matter on which side of the House they sit—and they can urge as briefly but as forcibly as they like that this is a vital question, that its effects are far-reaching, and that their constituents and friends look to them for really good service at this time. We know that members of Parliament (like editors) have large waste-paper baskets; but they (like editors) are also men of like passions with people in general, and they are not impervious to sensible straight talk, courteously but earnestly advanced. Secondly, our friends may assist by sending delegates to the National Conference of Progressive Educationists which is to be held at the King's Hall, Holborn, on Thursday, June 6, Lord SPENCER presiding. All who will do us the compliment of taking this suggestion seriously may get further information as to this Conference, by addressing the secretaries at the Union-chambers, Temple-street, Birmingham. It cannot be doubted that a strong and numerously-attended demonstration of the kind will have effect on the Parliamentary discussion; and that is, of course, the direct object to be gained. But the indirect object of reviving public interest in this great national duty is also to be aimed at, and it will be attained, if we, and our friends, and all who recognise its importance, rally our forces and become more ardent in the cause than some of us have been, we fear, of late.

LONDON DISTRICT UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

THE fifty-first annual meeting of this Society was held at Essex Hall on Thursday evening, May 2, the President, Sir J. T. BRUNNER, Bart., M.P., in the chair. There was a large attendance of members and friends, and the Secretary announced letters of regret for absence from Mrs. Bartram, Miss J. Durning Smith, Miss Preston, Mr. J. T. Preston, Mr. H. Chatfeild Clarke, and the Revs. W. Copeland Bowie and W. Wooding.

The report of the Committee was read by Mr. G. H. Clennell.

REPORT.

The report recorded the successful establishment of the Permanent Chapel Building Fund with an initial capital of £9,000, and the benefit to the churches of the district derived from the further sum of over £4,000 placed at their disposal. Of this £3,000 had already been allotted, and other claims were under consideration which would exhaust the balance. Good work had been done and progress had been made in most of the assisted churches, but the Committee had regretfully come to the conclusion that they must relinquish the work at Bermondsey. Mr. E. Howard, who had generously taken charge of the work there for six months, had reported that while Bermondsey offered opportunity for most valuable social work of the social settlement or mission character, he could hold out little or no prospect of a congregation being established which could at all approach a self-supporting basis, and after an experience of thirteen years the Committee felt that the work must now be left in other hands. The report concluded with a reference to Mr. David Martineau's retirement from office and a tribute to him as an ideal treasurer, and the Committee expressed the hope that they might long have the benefit of his wide experience and the inspiration of his genial presence.

Mr. DAVID MARTINEAU, who, after a service of thirty years, was retiring from the office of treasurer, on rising to present the accounts was very warmly received. The accounts showed that the deficit of £210 with which the year began had been increased to £338. Subscriptions for 1900 amounted to £242 14s., donations to £166 17s. 1d., and collections at eight chapels to £57 11s. 10d., while grants for churches amounting to £351 13s. 4d. had been received from the B. and F.U.A. The total grants made to eleven congregations amounted to £85 6s. 11d. Amounts received from the Bazaar Fund and paid over to churches did not appear in the account. The Society would in future not have to meet the expense of Bermondsey on which a large amount had been spent. Experience had shown that the work there, if it was carried on, must be of the nature of a Domestic Mission, which did not come within their scope; and what should be done was still under consideration. If they could secure from £800 to £1,000 for necessary improvements in the premises, and an income of £300 a year, Bermondsey might be carried on as a mission, and he understood that if the means could be found the London Domestic Mission Society was ready to undertake the charge of the new station. A generous offer had also been made by Sir E. Durning-Lawrence to give to the trustees five freehold houses, valued at £1,300, two of which could be used for enlarging the premises, and three for providing part of the necessary income. He hoped that they might be placed in a position to accept that offer, and that the work might go on. Referring to his own retirement from office, Mr. Martineau said that it was not because he had lost interest, and he might still have kept the book; but he was no longer able to go about among the congregations, as he felt it his duty as treasurer to do, to see exactly what the work was they were supporting, and to be able to form a right judgment in each case. For thirty years he had felt it an honour, and it had been his pleasure to do that work, and he paid a warm tribute to successive secretaries who had done so much in furtherance of their work. He trusted that with a new treasurer and the old subscribers a prosperous future lay before the Society.

The PRESIDENT, in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, said that he congratulated himself on being present to witness the gratitude they were showing to Mr. Martineau, and to join in their expressions of affection and good wishes. He then referred to the coming National and International meetings, and hoped the Hospitality Committee would be warmly supported by residents in London. A message had come to them from Russia. Tolstoy's declaration of his religious faith was one that had astonished a large part of the world, but it came very close to their hearts, and was a most welcome sign of advance in an unexpected quarter of the world.

The Rev. F. W. STANLEY seconded the motion, which was unanimously carried.

Mr. HAHNEMANN EPPS then made a statement as to the special appeal of the Committee. They had asked for donations amounting to £350 to cover last year's deficit, so that their valued treasurer might retire from office leaving a clear balance-sheet to his successor, and they had actually received £380 17s. 6d. from seventy-six donors, in sums varying from 2s. 6d. to £50, and it was specially gratifying to find that twenty of these had not hitherto been subscribers to the Society. It would therefore be a record year for their treasurer, who would be able to hand on a balance of nearly £50 to his successor. It was his privilege also to make a further announcement, for they had felt that they should like to mark Mr. Martineau's retirement by some special little symbol of their regard, and they wished therefore to present Mr. Martineau with his portrait, which would show their regard and esteem, nay, the affection felt towards him. Donations to this further fund had been limited to a guinea, so that many friends might join in it, and hitherto only a private notice had been given; but already seventy-seven donors had given promises, and now it would be open to other friends to claim the privilege of a share in this gift. A Committee had been formed, who would make all the necessary arrangements.

The Rev. W. G. TARRANT then moved:—

That the sincere and most cordial thanks of the subscribers are due, and are hereby respectfully tendered, to Mr. David Martineau, J.P., for his indefatigable and invaluable services as honorary treasurer to this society during the past thirty years; and that in accepting with deep regret his resignation of that office, we rejoice with him in the wide extension of Unitarian Christian work in the metropolitan area that has taken place under his wise direction and by his generous efforts during this period, the record of which will be to himself—we trust for many years—a source of gratifying memories, while it will remain to the society, and to Unitarians generally, a shining example and a permanent inspiration.

Members of that Society, he said, would know that there was no exaggeration in that resolution; those who had worked with Mr. Martineau on the Committee knew that no words, however strong, were adequate to the occasion. For eighteen of Mr. Martineau's thirty years of service it had been his privilege to work with him, and they all on the Committee felt that it would be impossible to find a warmer-hearted friend, a more diligent and faithful servant, a wiser counsellor or a more genial representative. There was only one defect in Mr. Martineau, and it was that he made it so very difficult for anyone to follow him. He had seen a wide extension of Unitarian Christian work in that area largely through their Society and largely through the aid of Mr. David Martineau. He had not spared himself either in effort or in time, and, it was fitting to say on that occasion, not financially either. Time after time he had cheerfully borne heavy deficits, and had shown such high qualities that they would find it very difficult to go on without such an officer. Particularly for young ministers it would be difficult to find one so much a tower of strength, a wise heartener, holding out a hand to the young as a true friend. His single aim had been to promote their work. There were doubtless different types of thought and practice in their churches, but to Mr. Martineau they had been all alike. The question of opinion had not arisen; he had only asked, was good work being done? His efforts had been by no means confined to that Society, but he had worked for the B. and F.U.A. and for the cause at large. Everywhere there was the same testimony of high regard, and of the value of his services. In the matter of the Ministers' Superannuation Fund he had shown the insatiate appetite of his mind for work. Then he was a keen politician and a most earnest social reformer. Such a record made one proud to belong to a community that could grow such men. Mr. Tarrant concluded with an expression of the hope that Mr. Martineau as he passed into the vale of years might cherish in his heart's core the consciousness that he had, not only the admiration, but the gratitude and personal attachment and affection of his friends.

Mr. S. S. TAYLER seconded the resolution, as an old member of the Society, who had sat with Mr. Martineau on the Committee for those thirty years, and was present at the meeting when he was appointed treasurer. They had been anxious to extend their work, and Mr. Martineau had never discouraged them. There had been debts, but he had always found the money, with that cheerful active way in which he always helped, and he had done a great deal more than could be expected of a treasurer. If they had more of such men, their prosperity in London would be immensely greater than it was.

Mr. DAVID MARTINEAU acknowledged the resolution with much feeling, deprecating the too flattering words that had been used concerning his work. It had simply been that if he saw a duty he thought he could do, he had tried; and he had been admirably supported by the Committee and by the members of the Society, until he was ashamed to come to them for any more. And now they had done it again! He thought that the payment of the debt was to be their testimonial, and when he was asked about a portrait, he said, No, they must not do it; but they had asked other members of his family, and they had a different feeling about it. He thanked them with all his heart. He had not worked for their thanks, he worked for the good of the cause.

On the motion of Mr. J. HARRISON, seconded by the Rev. V. D. DAVIS, the officers and Committee were appointed, with Mr. David Martineau as president, Mr. T. H. Terry treasurer, and the Rev. J. E. Stronge and Mr. G. H. Clennell secretaries.

Mr. A. J. MUNDELLA moved:—

That this meeting condemns the recent attempts to cripple the natural growth of our present system of national education, and is of opinion that no reform will be satisfactory which does not give the inhabitants of each locality the power to provide for their children an efficient elementary, secondary and technical education, free, unsectarian and under popular control.

Unitarians, he said, were pledged to civil and religious liberty, and the education question ought to be very near to their hearts. Underneath all special questions there were great issues at stake. There were fundamental differences of opinion. There was the clerical ideal that the schools must be used primarily for the maintenance of some particular religious belief. On the other hand, there was the ideal which put education first, the education of the whole people down to the humblest, and held it to be essential to the progress of the nation, political, social and above all religious. Those two principles had been in conflict throughout the whole of the civilised world. It was a very ancient struggle. If now they were being beaten by the better education of Germany it was because Luther at the beginning of the Reformation told his people to take education out of the hands of the priests into their own hands. And Scotchmen now came so much to the front because John Knox had established a thorough system of education under popular control. Americans also had a similar advantage in their school system. Their own forefathers had struggled for this cause a century ago, and had been met by the clerical forces, indifferent to the education of the people. That influence was still dominant. In 1870 something like popular control had been established, but it had been fought ever since, and the people's schools were being crippled and restricted in the interest of clericalism. That was the golden age of every vested interest, they were coming to a crisis of the fight, and they must awake to the fact that their privileges were being filched away. He was proud to appeal to their community on behalf of the principles of national education.

The Rev. H. S. PERRIS seconded the resolution, and said it was scandalous in that time of enormous income and expenditure that the cause of national education should be crippled and treated as it was by the Government in a niggling and mean way. The tendency to reaction must be resisted to the uttermost.

The PRESIDENT, in putting the resolution, said they were just as shamefully lacking in means for the highest education as for primary, secondary, and technical education. Germany had six great engineering schools established by Government, the United States had twelve, but their own great country had not one. If they did not improve their means for the highest education they must look forward to a great impoverishment of their country, and he wished to be free from that responsibility. With their glorious inheritance they must join in the battle and do their duty to the country and their children, that England might take the place she ought to have at the head of the civilised world.

A vote of thanks to the President, proposed by the Rev. J. E. STRONGE, and carried by acclamation, brought the meeting to a close.

LONDON DOMESTIC MISSION.

THE sixty-sixth annual meeting was held on Tuesday evening in the schoolroom of Essex Church, Kensington, the Rev. PHILIP H. WICKSTEED, M.A., in the chair.

After an opening hymn, Mr. PHILIP ROSCOE, treasurer, presented his statement of accounts, which showed that the year opening with £30 in hand ended with an adverse balance of £86, while three legacies, amounting to £250, had also been spent. The Society, he said, was not yet reduced to beggary, but was existing in a state of shabby gentility, like Mr. Micawber always hoping that something would turn up. They had just enough to scrape along with for their regular work, but were crippled by the lack of further means, so that they had to refuse an extra 2s. a week to an over-worked assistant, and had to leave grimy walls without whitewash. Much more money, if they had it, could be usefully spent, and he appealed for more and increased regular subscriptions.

The Rev. Dr. G. DAWES HICKS, as secretary, then read the Committee's report:—

THE REPORT.

The report recorded the retirement of the Rev. Joseph Pollard from the Rhyl-street Mission, which he had faithfully served since its establishment in 1882, and the appointment of Mr. W. Wilson, of Glasgow. A fund of over £500, contributed by friends, had secured an annuity to Mr. Pollard, and he had found a happy settlement at Ballymena, in the North of Ireland. The work at George's-row and Bell-street had been carried steadily on, and at the latter Mission the value of the men's club and a club for elder boys was specially noted. A cottage had been taken at Billingshurst until Lady-day 1902, as a Convalescent Home for the Bell-street Mission, the Holly Hill Jubilee Fund undertaking to pay the rent up to that date.

Legacies of £50 each from Mrs. C. Janson and Mr. Stephen Busk, and £150 from Miss Lister had been received. Certain congregations had held collections for the Mission, but the wish was expressed that the custom might be more widely observed. Thanks were tendered to Mr. J. H. Leigh for a Shakespeare reading he had given on behalf of the Mission funds, realising £32 17s.

A tribute was paid to the memory of the Rev. C. L. Corkran, who had been connected with the Society for over fifty years, having entered on his work at Spicer-street in 1848. "Of his splendid missionary work, the story is preserved in the reports of former years; and, whilst his memory is held in reverence and gratitude by hundreds of persons, it was no less a prophet than Dr. Martineau who predicted that his life would be taken by successors as a model of what the steward of a Christian commission ought to be." And the report concluded:—

In the century upon which we have now entered, problems of social import will be, for many years to come, uppermost in the minds of men. Slowly but surely the truth is becoming recognised that no section of the community can make the most of life or get out of it all that it has to yield, so long as any section is prevented, through whatever causes, from sharing in the common heritage of humanity. And the lines upon which the new reformation will proceed are also becoming increasingly clear. On the one hand, those who are striving for the amelioration of the material conditions of our working-class population are being led to the conclusion that it is only "mind and character" that can either make improved material surroundings contribute to happiness, or even secure them with certainty; on the other hand, religious reformers are declaring that individual character amongst the wage-earners of our great cities is being "paralysed" and "wrecked," through its having no fitting environment, and not being "brought into firm touch with enduring human power." Your missionaries have these two reciprocal factors constantly in view. As religious teachers, they labour to spiritualise the motives and aims of those to whom they minister; as social workers, they seek to alleviate the miseries around them, and to point out the evils which merely individual effort cannot relieve. And it is because your Committee believe in these methods and in their ultimate success, that they look forward to the Missions contributing in their humble way to the establishment of the nobler society that is to be.

The CHAIRMAN, in moving the adoption of the reports and treasurer's statement, referred especially to the sentence in the report above quoted, beginning "Slowly but surely the truth is becoming recognised,"—a truth expressed also in the lines of William Morris:—

Nor shall any lack a share
In the toil and the gain of living,
In the days when the world grows fair.

Until that time came the social organism was diseased. Many lacked their share in the toil of living, and many lacked their share in the gain. And those who lacked their share in the toil, so long as that toil was so piled upon others as to make them lack their share in the gain, suffered even a deeper deprivation of the gain of living than those others. Those who had seen something of the different lots and lacks of men got a new understanding of what was really essential to true life. There were chosen spirits whom no outward circumstances could degrade, but there were other souls in whom it seemed that no circumstances however favourable could secure a blossoming into true humanity. But they also knew that while there were conditions which made that full human life seem all but a miracle, there were conditions which made the absence of it seem strange and almost inexplicable. They must aim steadily to secure such conditions for all sections of society as should make a truly human life not a thing to marvel at, but the thing one would naturally expect.

No one could suppose that such conditions existed for all, or nearly all, of the people of this country, and they must allow the thought to exert a constant pressure on their ideals of life, that no section could make the most of life so long as any section was prevented from sharing in the common heritage of humanity. They must ask themselves whether the things for which they personally cared and strove were prizes which would be won by others losing, or were their ideals so framed that they worked with and not against the general welfare and the attainment by all of the "toil and gain of living." And they must strive to bring their own effort directly to bear on the social problem, so as to develop the power and enlarge the opportunity of the least fortunate. There was an old definition of justice as that which secured the balance between capacity and opportunity. God and Nature made no capacity to which they did not give opportunity, and society was in a state of injustice if the capacity of one thwarted that of another. There would be justice when the balance was so preserved that no capacity was starved for the lack of its opportunity.

In their missions there was opportunity for many to do direct work to that end. They had there the whole field of life open to ameliorating effort, and nothing was more touching than the quick response of gratitude in the needy for any expression of genuine sympathy. The best kind of help was not that of the man who was simply ready to share with other things in which he himself was interested, but that which entered into the lives of others, understanding their possibilities and so rendering personal service. It was a pity that the appeal of philanthropy came to so many of them first in the form of Sunday-school teaching, which was most difficult, and required the rarest gifts, while there were so many other ways of service, demanding simply the desire to help in self-forgetfulness. If only they had simplicity and directness of purpose they could bring light and strength to others, and in their missions there were many ways of rendering such help. And for those who could give no personal service there was the way of giving money. He deprecated in the strongest terms any low view of money and of the value and meaning of such gifts. Money was the symbol of all their best purposes transmuted into fact, and they should trace their gifts of money down to the actual work done in the missions, to the rooms brightened, the enlarged horizon, the heart well-nigh broken—of the sufferer and of the missionary—healed, and the spiritual life awakened. That was the work they sustained by their gifts, and he concluded with a very earnest appeal for more ample means.

Mr. F. W. LAWRENCE seconded the motion, and emphasised the extreme need of sympathy in such work, the getting into personal fellowship with those to whom they wished to minister. It was not money nor advice they valued most, but personal sympathy; the human rather than the mechanical element was essential to their work. People who had more material possessions were apt to think that they had also a higher soul, a higher form of life, but that was a tremendous mistake. There were in the lives of the poor many beautiful things which the rich had not got, and he sympathised most warmly with those attempts which were made not so much to teach people what they ought to do as simply to stand by them as a friend. Those who had education and worldly advantages made a great mistake when they thought they had only to give to others, they had also much to receive. In such work they ought not to think only of the very poor. Among the working classes were large numbers of independent men with a broad out-look on life, and they ought to be trusted and their help sought. The habit of the very rich going to the very poor and ignoring those who stood between led to complete misunderstanding. They ought to look at the whole of life. Of recent years there had been a time of great material prosperity, but a period of dearth was coming, and to face that all the sections of humanity would have to understand one another and stand by one another as friends.

The Rev. J. EDWIN ODGERS then moved a resolution of confidence in the principles of the Society and appreciation of the work of the missionaries. He spoke very warmly of the sympathy they must always feel for the missionaries, of the cheerful spirit they maintained in the midst of their most trying work, and the belief in goodness and in the value of such religious work, which they quickened. He recalled the memory of John Johns, the first minister of the Liverpool Domestic Mission, whom Mr. Thom had discovered and brought from his country home in Devonshire. He had proved himself an ideal missionary, and his first reports marked an epoch in sociology, telling one half of the world how the other half lived, and making the knowledge real as it had not been before. John Johns was remembered as a truly saintly man, and had been a great social force in Liverpool. Their missionaries were happy in that they so often saw the results of their good work. He moved that resolution with the most cordial goodwill.

Mr. W. W. BRUCE seconded the resolution, and as a member for the past nine years of the Housing Committee of the County Council, spoke of the most difficult and pressing problem with which they had to deal. The conscience of London was gradually awakening to the urgency of the question. Mr. Summers had urged that more blocks of dwellings should be built in over-crowded districts, and had mentioned 4s. a week as the rent paid for a single room; but unfortunately 4s. was only paid where over-crowding was allowed, and in County Council buildings and those of Dwellings Companies, over-crowding could not be permitted, and the necessary rent was more than the people could pay. He instanced the area of Clare Market, north of the Strand, where two and a-half acres of most insanitary property, which had an enormous death-rate, had been cleared, and on which buildings were to be erected. A woman had complained to the magistrates that she was turned out of her room, where she and her husband and five children had lived, paying a rent of 5s. She had been told that with such a family she must have three rooms, and was offered rooms at 2s. 8d. a week. There was the difficulty, for that came to more than the 5s. she had been paying, and there were probably hundreds of thousands of families of from three to ten living in single rooms in London. Because London was the centre of the trade and finance, the law and government, of the Empire, land there had become three times too valuable for people to live upon it, and if they remained they were forced to live three times too densely. The only cure for that great evil was to increase the means of locomotion in every direction, that the people might escape from the net in which they were caught. By broad thoroughfares out from the centre, with cheap transit by electric rail and tram, they must find the remedy. In connection with the new Holborn to Strand thoroughfare the County Council had been obliged to rehouse a number of people, and to show how the problem worked out he stated that the land they had acquired for building at a cost of £200,000 had been written down for their purpose at £40,000, in view of the cost of building and the rent the people could pay. While they were working at that great problem they must do the best they could for the people under their present conditions, and the efforts of the Missionaries had his complete sympathy.

The resolution having been cordially passed, the Revs. F. SUMMERS, B. K. GRAY, and W. WILSON responded, and on the motion of the Rev. F. K. FREESTON, seconded by Mr. ARTHUR SHARPE, the officers and committee were appointed. A vote of thanks to the chairman and to the congregation of Essex Church, moved by the Rev. V. D. DAVIS, and seconded by Mr. H. CHATFEILD CLARKE, brought the meeting to a close.

Badcock and Mrs. Badcock; Taunton, Mr. F. Colmar and Mrs. Phillips; Trowbridge, Rev. J. Wain, Mr. W. Walker, J.P., and Mr. James Harper; Torquay, Rev. A. E. O'Connor, B.D., and Miss Heaviside; Yeovil, Mr. W. B. Matthews.

The business meeting was held in the morning in Christ Church Chapel, the President, the Rev. H. S. Solly, M.A., in the chair. After an opening hymn and prayer by the Rev. Alfred Lancaster, the roll was called by the hon. sec., the Rev. A. N. Blatchford.

The PRESIDENT, in his annual address, dealt first with public affairs, speaking of the war in South Africa, the condition of China, and the death of the Queen and the accession of Edward VII. As to the work of their Union, he referred specially to the starting of the Twentieth Century Fund, which showed that they did not mean to desert any of their smaller churches, which had long and bravely battled against adverse conditions. The condition of the West of England had changed greatly since it ceased to be the centre of the woollen industry, and many of their old congregations had suffered greatly. Other causes also rendered their work more difficult, the spread of liberal thought in other bodies and the absence of any great awakening to the need of strict veracity in worship, which might still bring to them many adherents from the Church of England and other quarters. But while they waited for better days they must acknowledge the genuine heroism which kept the flag flying in spite of all social disadvantage and the many religious drawbacks inseparable from religious isolation. The members of the Southern Association had set them a good example in their Twentieth Century Fund, and in following it they hoped to bring the effort to completion, and so to use the Fund as not to relax any local effort. The report admirably showed the work they were doing, and they were greatly indebted to Mr. Blatchford, who conducted the affairs of the Union in so zealous a spirit, and whose work for the Special Fund deserved grateful recognition. Having paid a tribute to the memory of the late William Blake, and spoken of the great services rendered, especially to the smaller congregations of the district by members of families descended from ministers in the old days, the President concluded by welcoming the new-comers to the district, the Rev. J. McDowell to Bath, and the Rev. J. M. Connell to Exeter as Mr. Chignell's associate, and expressing the hope that the vacant pulpits of Taunton, Plymouth, and Moreton Hampstead would soon be filled.

The Rev. A. N. BLATCHFORD then presented the Committee's report and the statement of accounts.

THE REPORT.

The report opened with a cordial acknowledgment of the help received from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and referred to the loss sustained by the friends of liberal Christianity in the West of England through the death of Mr. William Blake, of South Petherton, in the following terms:—

"They would place on record their grateful appreciation of the many and effective services he so ungrudgingly rendered the Union by his wise and ever-ready counsel. They remember his generous help, which resulted in the restoration of more than one of our ancient houses of prayer in the western district. They recognise him as embodying the spirit of a cultured and gracious, but ever fearless, Nonconformity, and they most respectfully offer to the members of his family their sincere and respectful sympathy."

The report then chronicled the changes in the ministry of the district, paying a warm tribute to the services rendered by the Rev. F. W. Stanley, for many years as secretary of the Union; and it concluded as follows:—

The important question of finance has engaged the serious, and, it may be added, the generous consideration both of members of your committee, and of influential friends in connection with the Union. Those members of the Western Union who have been most closely associated with its work have long felt the inadequacy of its resources for the purposes which it is intended to meet. The opening of a new century has seemed to some of the oldest supporters of the Union an appropriate occasion for collecting a fund, the income of which may be devoted to furthering the aims of the Union, and supplementing the annual subscriptions of its members. A few friends have offered donations for this purpose, hoping that their lead will be widely followed, and a substantial sum collected, as has already been done in other districts. From the contributions already forthcoming for this "Twentieth Century Fund," your committee have a good hope that a total of at least £1,000 may be ere long realised.

On the motion of Mr. W. COLFOX, J.P., seconded by Mr. J. K. CHAMPION, the report was adopted, and on the motion of Mr. M. B. BAKER, seconded by Mr. E. GOODLAND, the officers and committee were elected, with Mr. W. Walker, J.P., as president, Mr. P. J. Worsley, J.P., treasurer, and the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, secretary.

THE LUNCHEON.

Luncheon followed the business meeting in the schoolroom of the Congregational Chapel, Alderman T. GOOD, J.P., presiding, and among those present being the Revs. F. Hirst (Congregational), J. Wilson (Methodist Free Church), and V. H. Culliford (Bible Christian).

The CHAIRMAN proposed the loyal toast, and, on behalf of the Mayor, whose enforced absence he regretted, welcomed the members of the Union to the town.

Mr. W. COLFOX, J.P., gave the toast of "Civil and Religious Liberty." He said it was the outcome of civil and religious liberty that they were able to meet there, and that so many who did not see eye to eye with them on matters of doctrine, but who did see with them in matters of civil and religious liberty, should be there to join with them that day. That was not the first occasion he had met the chairman, for he was there last year at the inauguration of the Blake memorial. Blake himself was a man who was first and foremost in the expression of feelings such as these. He referred to the change marked by the position of Nonconformists at Oxford, and the presence there of Manchester and Mansfield Colleges, and spoke also of Willaston School, near Nantwich, which was founded on the same principle as Manchester College.

The Rev. F. HIRST replied to the toast. He said as pastor of the Congregational Church worshipping there he welcomed them most heartily to that schoolroom. The fact of their meeting there was one of the manifestations of civil and religious liberty. There was a time when it would have been impossible to come there together to secularise their cups and saucers and knives and forks. He was glad, however, they could look over the barrier and wish them God-speed in the splendid work they were doing for humanity and for God. Notwithstanding all the gains in which they could rejoice there was much land yet to be possessed. They remembered the Cockerton judgment, a disgrace on their civilisation. They remembered how at the present time a sister church at Blackpool had been distrained on and the people there were being persecuted for tithe rent, which was a glimpse of the old days before they rejoiced in their present civil and religious liberty. They had still need to make strenuous efforts. He concluded with an expression of the indebtedness of all Free Churchmen to Unitarian writers, and especially to Dr. Martineau, and also for many of their hymns. They were driven to the conclusion—in things necessary, unity; in things doubtful, liberty; in all things, love.

THE SERVICE.

In the afternoon religious service was held in Christ Church Chapel, conducted by the Rev. J. FISHER JONES, of Cheltenham, and a sermon was preached by the Rev. J. COLLINS ODGERS, of Bury, from the text Acts xxvi. 19, "I was not disobedient to the heavenly vision."

Tea followed in the Congregational Schoolroom, when the Rev. A. N. BLATCHFORD thanked the Congregationalists for their kindness in lending the room, and the Rev. F. HIRST replied.

EVENING MEETING.

In the evening a public meeting was held in Christ Church Chapel, and was well attended. The Rev. H. S. SOLLY, the President, again took the chair, and in his opening address spoke of their traditional faith as Unitarians and Free Christians, and the stronger reasons of personal conviction which held many of them fast to their loyalty. In religion men were not willing to go back to the very beginning. They only went back as far as they were forced to go back on manifest errors and gross abuses. Speaking broadly, they might say the Church of England went back to the Prayer-book: they said "We will translate the Latin into English, but we will be very careful to keep our Bishops and our system of Episcopalian Government." The Puritans went beyond that, they went back to the Bible, and said there they were content to stop, never thinking to ask whether everything in the Bible was true or not. Going back to the Bible meant a great variety of interpretation, such as they saw among the Presbyterians and the Independents. Their Unitarianism undoubtedly had sprung from a determination to go back to the facts, to go back beyond the Prayer-book, to go back beyond the Bible, to go back to the facts on which the Bible itself rested, to go back to the inspiration which God gave to every human heart and soul and to find in those ultimate facts of spiritual life and spiritual communion the basis of their faith. They believed there was still grand progress before them, but they had an absolutely firm faith in the foundation upon which they were building.

The Rev. JOHN MCDOWELL (of Bath) was the next speaker, his subject being "A thought, a need, and a suggestion." His thought was that the last century witnessed the secularisation of the world's thought and life, and he believed that this century, which was still young, would see the spiritualisation of our thought and life. His second point was a need—and he held that "togetherness" was their great need. He pleaded for it in the congregation. Was there any caste feeling in their ministry or their congregations? He pleaded for a simple fellowship, a simple brotherhood, a united love of the whole, covering the weakest and the poorest with its strength, its brotherhood, and its help. His suggestion was that their brethren of the larger towns and churches should send a deputation to their small and struggling churches and give them their counsel, their brotherhood, encouragement, and help.

The Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE gave an address on "The Prospects of Liberal Christianity." He said, looking at it from one side they might think the prospects of Liberal Christianity were not very bright, but that did not seem to him the true way to look at the question. If they were convinced in their minds and hearts that the great principles of Liberal Christianity were true and good and noble and helpful then it was their duty, even if there was only a handful of them, to stand by the true, the right, and the good, frankly and fearlessly, feeling confident that truth and right and good must prevail. We were living in times of grave doubt and perplexity and unrest in regard to all the great questions of religious thought and life, and the tokens of unrest were to be seen in all directions, inside and outside the churches. He did not believe it would be possible to find in the ranks of orthodoxy to-day a speaker who would get up in Exeter Hall and take out his watch and tell the people how many souls were going to hell-fire according to the number of ticks his watch gave. A speech like that, however, was made in Exeter Hall less than a quarter of a century ago. At the Church Congress they found a large number of men breaking away from the old ways of thinking. In the newspapers also—even the country newspapers, with few exceptions — they saw a different way of treating religious questions, and magazines and books, even the popular novels, were teaching the principles of Liberal Christianity. There could be no greater mistake in the world than the idea that religion was founded by priests. It was the religious inspiration of man that brought priests into existence. Great liberal movements in religion did not go on by themselves, and unless there were earnest living men and women with steadfast principles and determined effort these movements for the time might droop and fade and die, and it, therefore, behoved them to put all the life and zeal into the work they could command.

The Rev. John Birks, F.G.S. (of Derby), followed with a thoughtful and interesting speech on "Sympathy in our Church life and work." He rejoiced that in that West of England they were not letting the little churches die out, but that they were doing their very best to keep the light burning in the various places, because wherever these little Unitarian republics were found they would feed the fires of truth, uphold civil and religious liberty, and help to make life bright and healthy, and save it from corruption. He looked at the Sunday-school movement as a valuable help to the cause.

The Chairman expressed the thanks of the meeting to the Rev. J. C. Odgers, B.A., for his sermon that afternoon.

The Rev. J. C. Odgers returned thanks. It was always a pleasure to him to come to his native West, a part of England which was dear to him owing to ancestral connections and especial family ties. In the West they had a harder battle to fight than they had in the North. They were more scattered, their bonds of connection were fewer than they were in the neighbourhood round Manchester. All the more honour, then, to those in the West of England who so well, from year's end to year's end, conscientiously did their duty in their several spheres.

A hymn and the Benediction, pronounced by the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, brought the meeting to a close.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

APPEAL.

Mr. Cosens Prior, of Langar House, Portsmouth, sends us the following appeal:—In connection with the High-street Chapel, we are carrying on a Boys' Club, more especially for boys from the slums, to keep them at least one night from the dangers of street life. Needless to say, our work in this direction is highly appreciated by the boys who resort to the club on Friday evenings, where they have games, drill, &c. May I ask your readers if they could help by gifts of money, games, books, or bound volumes of periodicals such as The Boys' Own Paper or Chums, which would be so very useful and most welcome at the present time. I shall be glad to receive any donations, &c., for the purpose above stated.

Aberdeen.—A series of eight special religious services, conducted by the Rev. Alexander Webster, in the Union Hall on Sunday evening (assisted by a grant from the McQuaker Trustees), closed on May 5. The subjects treated were: "Theology in the Poets," by the Rev. Stopford Brooke, illustrative of the modern standard of literary religious judgment; "Robert Elsmere," illustrative of the spirit and tendency of the Higher Criticism; "Lohengrin," illustrative of the true attitude of the soul towards the mystery of the Universe; "Oliver Wendell Holmes," type of the blithe believer in God; "Florence Nightingale," exemplar of human sympathy; "Charles Darwin," pattern of intellectual devotion to truth; "James Martineau," type of the rational thinker and spiritual seer. The Rev. Walter Walsh, Dundee, took one of the services, and spoke of "The Catholic Church." Though the spring evenings were not favourable to indoor meetings, the attendance was good, and increased as the services proceeded. The audiences included a number of persons who never enter the Unitarian Church, but have an unconfessed sympathy with liberal religion.

Accrington.—The Sunday-school anniversary services were held on Sunday last, the Rev. Matthew R. Scott, of Cockey Moor, being the preacher. The afternoon service was specially arranged for the children, but proved helpful to many of riper years. The hymns were accompanied by a small orchestra, in addition to the organ. The services were bright, strenuous, and joyous. Old hymns were sung to familiar tunes. We were gladdened by the presence of a few friends from Padiham and Burnley. Mr. Scott's sermons made a deep impression.

Belfast Domestic Mission.—The closing meeting of the winter's work was held a few nights ago; about sixty sat down to tea, after which through the kindness of the Misses Bruce, a number of plants were disposed of at a nominal price to provide prizes for the most successful growers during the coming summer. The Rev. G. J. Slipper addressed those present on the work of the Mission generally, and Miss J. Bruce, in some well-chosen words, imparted instructions as to the growing of the plants. The Rev. J. Pollard addressed the meeting, and was warmly received by his many old friends.

Blackpool: South Shore.—The anniversary services were held last Sunday in the Masonic Hall, which was tastefully decorated with flowers. Mr. Charles Wright, of Manchester, preached morning and evening to good congregations, and special music was given under the direction of Mr. E. S. Heywood, Mr. John Cunliffe presiding at the organ. The collections amounted to £10 0s. 7d. Taking advantage of the Blackpool Tradesmen's Holiday, the congregation had their annual trip on Tuesday, going on this occasion to Windermere, where a very pleasant day was spent.

Chester.—The annual meeting of the congregation was held in the schoolroom on Monday, May 6. The treasurer's statement of accounts, showing a small balance in hand, was taken as read and passed. The minister, the Rev. H. E. Haycock, presented a report of the winter's work, portions of which led to a useful and interesting discussion. The report pointed to signs of a healthy activity in the congregation, and an animating spirit favourable to steady progress and slowly-growing success; it gave expression to the general feeling of satisfaction that by the united and continued effort of the congregation the adverse balance against the restoration fund had been reduced to the small amount of £20—an eminently satisfactory state of affairs when it was remembered that the expenditure had amounted to close upon £1,000. The bicentenary celebration was an event that would be long remembered, and grateful reference was made to Sir John Brunner for his offer of memorial windows to Matthew Henry and Dr. Martineau. The work of the Sunday-school and its connected institutions had been well maintained, and the Literary and Social Union had done useful work. In regard to the future, the congregation was reminded that the final decoration of the chapel remained to be done, and that Sir John Brunner's generous gift of stained windows would necessitate the rebuilding of the organ, which at present covered one of the side lights. Then it was hoped that, at the beginning of the winter, they would inaugurate a Forward Movement with the object of bringing their religious position more prominently before the public; and for all these things they would need money. They could not afford to stand still, and it was their duty to proclaim their Gospel as widely as possible, to try to clear away the misconceptions that hindered their progress, and to enlarge their religious brotherhood. On the motion of Mr. William Orrett, seconded by Mr. F. Garside, the report was accepted.

Dover.—On Sunday last, May 5, the 258th anniversary of the congregation and the 81st of the present building was held. Dr. Lawson Dodd conducted the services, and delivered two excellent discourses on "Our Indebtedness" and "The Acceptable Time." The congregations were larger than usual, and a collection was taken on behalf of the Provincial Assembly.

Dudley (Resignation).—The Rev. A. H. Shelley has resigned the pulpit of the Old Meeting, and proposes to conclude his ministry at Dudley, which began in 1893, on or before March 25, 1902.

Dukinfield.—The annual Sunday-school sermons were preached in the Old Chapel last Sunday (May 5), by the Rev. Frank K. Freeston, to large congregations. A band of children from the school, arranged on a platform erected round the pulpit, sang sweetly some beautiful hymns taught them by Mr. W. Wooley. Mr. Freeston's three interesting discourses were on "Reverence," "Wishing," and "Christian Chivalry." The collections for the day amounted to £63—a small increase on last year. Several contributions have since been received from friends unable to be present. The services were much enjoyed by all who attended them.

Glasgow: St. Vincent-street.—The May number of the Monthly Record contains the first part of an historical sketch of the congregation, which was founded in 1810, through the labours of Richard Wright, and in the following year obtained the services as minister of the Rev. James Yates. The present instalment of the sketch reaches the appointment of the Rev. H. W. Crosskey in 1852. The copy which has reached us has the date corrected to that year, but in the following line Taylor should also be corrected to Tayler.

Heywood.—The Sunday-school sermons were preached on 5th inst. by the Rev. C. J. Street, M.A., LL.B., of Bolton. Special anthems and hymns were rendered by a largely augmented choir. There were large congregations at both the services, and the offertories for the day amounted to £57 10s.

London: Essex Church.—To-morrow morning the Rev. Frank K. Freeston begins a short series of sermons on "Human Documents," comprising I.—"Channing's Symphony." II.—"Inter Amicos." III.—"Two Boston Preachers."

London: Peckham.—Under the direction of Mr. W. R. Marshall (Sunday-school secretary) and Mr. J. C. Griffin (acting superintendent) an entertainment was given on Saturday last in aid of the Avondale-road Sunday-school excursion fund. There was a good audience, thoroughly appreciative of the concert and dramatic performance presented, and the result was also, from a financial point of view, highly satisfactory.

London: Stepney.—On Sunday afternoon, at the monthly conference in College Chapel, Mr. P. W. Ames presided over a largely attended meeting, when an animated discussion was maintained on "Brotherhood in Industry." It was opened by Mr. J. R. Macdonald in a masterly address, in which he reviewed the progress of modern industry with its minute division of labour, and asserted that Brotherhood in Industry was an accomplished fact up to a certain point—namely, co-operation in production, which was the great problem of the nineteenth century. The corresponding problem of the twentieth century is the proper use and distribution of wealth. Real stability of any society cannot be secured by balancing conflicting interests, but by replacing them by a true sense of brotherhood, which alone can solve social problems, and help on the solid advance and progress of the people. On the motion of Miss Florence Hill, a hearty vote of thanks was accorded to Mr. Macdonald for his address. In the evening Mr. Macdonald preached on "National Character and Ideals."

Manchester: Longsight.—The annual sermons were preached on Sunday last by the Rev. E. W. Lummis, M.A., of Warrington. In the afternoon a musical service was held, when choral selections were given by the choir, and solos rendered by two prominent Manchester vocalists—Miss Stuart Cummins and Mr. A. Wardley. At the evening service Dr. Garrett's anthem, "Just Judge of Heaven," was rendered by the choir, with Miss Bertha Guthrie as soloist. Mr. Lummis's discourses were heartily appreciated, and it is satisfactory to report good attendances in the afternoon and evening particularly, and also an increase in the collections as compared with the past two years.

Mossley.—The Sunday-school anniversary services were conducted on Sunday last, in the morning and afternoon, by the Rev. George Fox (the first minister of the congregation), and in the evening by the Rev. A. C. Fox, B.A., of Glossop. The congregations were large, and the collections amounted to £57 2s.

North-East Lancashire Sunday School Union.—A conference of teachers was held at Colne on Saturday, May 4, when an admirable paper was read by Mr. J. T. Harrison, of Padiham, the subject being, "Some Qualifications of the Sunday-school Teacher of To-day." These he summed up as Faith, Earnestness, Prayerfulness, Tact, Punctuality, and Regularity. The discussion which followed was taken part in by the Revs. Arthur W. Fox, W. H. Burgess, J. H. Wicksteed, E. A. Voysey, and T. Leyland, Mr. Duerden, Miss Holt, and others. Mr. Harrison responded, and a vote of thanks to the Colne friends closed a pleasant meeting.

Tamworth (Resignation).—The congregation has received, with great regret, the resignation of the Rev. J. Howard, after nearly fifteen years of united and acceptable service. He will terminate his ministry at the close of June.

Tavistock.—The ancient custom of preaching a sermon at the Abbey Chapel on the first Wednesday of May was duly observed. The text is the same every year, "Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth."

THE May number of The Coming Day opens with Mr. Page Hopps's Good Friday sermon, "Small Things and Great—and God," preached at the annual meeting of the Manchester Sunday School Association, which we were privileged to publish at the time. Many of our friends, we feel sure, will be glad to have the sermon in the larger type and handier form of Mr. Hopps's little magazine.

WE understand that the Rev. R. Balmforth, minister of the Free Protestant Church, Capetown, is anxious to come home for a three months' visit, and would be glad to arrange with a brother minister to take his place at Capetown for that period. Anyone who would consider such an exchange may apply for further information to the Secretary of the B. and F.U.A. at Essex Hall.

OUR readers may remember that in February last we inserted a letter from the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, B.A., President of the Sunday School Association, asking for more cordial support for the Association's Annual Publication, The Helper. We are glad to hear that the response has been most gratifying, and that not a single copy of The Helper for 1901 now remains for sale. It might be mentioned that copies of the issues for 1898, 1899, and 1900 remain, and that these volumes, although dated, are not out of date, and are as useful as Helpers now as they were when published.

ABERYSTWYTH

("The Biarritz of Wales")

Is highly recommended for invalids. It possesses the most equable temperature, its shore being swept by the Gulf Stream and the S.W. breezes of the Atlantic. The drainage is perfect, and the town is supplied with the purest water from Plynlimmon. The late Sir James Clarke, M.P., says: "A fortnight in Aberystwyth is equivalent to a month's residence in most watering places." Guides on application to the Town Clerk.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

OUR readers have only to consult the time table which we have had prepared in order to discover what a rich and unique treat is in store for all who are able to visit London in Whit-week. Never before in this country has such a series of meetings been organised, and we are delighted to learn that the attendance promises to exceed all expectations of the Committee. Quite large parties of friends are coming from cities so far removed as Newcastle-on-Tyne and Swansea, while the contingent from Ireland will be both large and representative. Tickets and invitations have now been forwarded to all ministers and delegates who have intimated their intention of being present. The correspondence and work have kept the secretary and his assistants exceedingly busy, and we hope they will be spared the arrival of a shoal of letters at the last moment from people who might write at once while there is still time to attend to their wishes.

THE Duke of Cornwall and York opened the first Parliament of united Australia in the great Exhibition Building at Melbourne on Thursday, May 9. Some old ceremonial was observed, after the manner of the British Parliament, even "Black Rod" appearing in the Antipodes, but the greater part of the observance belonged to the new order, as when after prayers had been read by the Governor, the whole audience, estimated at from twelve to fifteen thousand, joined with the Senate and House of Representatives in singing the Hundredth Psalm. Having declared the Parliament open, the Duke read the following message from his father, the King :—

My thoughts are with you on this auspicious occasion. I wish the Commonwealth of Australia every happiness and prosperity.

That must be the heartfelt wish of English-speaking people throughout the world.

THE Dean of Christ Church has been appointed Bishop of Oxford, in succession to the late Dr. Stubbs. The Very Rev. Francis Paget, D.D., who is fifty years of age, has been Dean since 1892. A son of the late Sir James Paget, he was a student of Christ Church, and in 1885 was appointed Regius Professor of Pastoral Theology. He contributed the Essay on Sacraments to "Lux Mundi."

THE annual meeting of the National Antivivisection Society was held in St. James's Hall on Thursday evening, May 9, when the great hall was well filled with an earnest and enthusiastic audience. The late Lord Shaftesbury was the first president of the Society, and for some years the Council did not feel that they could appoint any successor to him; but Lord Llangattock has now accepted the office, and presided over last week's meeting. Over the platform the well-known lines from Titus Andronicus were displayed as a motto :—

Wouldst thou draw near the nature of the gods ?
Draw near them then in being merciful :
Sweet mercy is nobility's true badge.

The chief speakers, in addition to the Chairman, were the Hon. Stephen Coleridge and Archdeacon Wilberforce, and the resolution of the evening, "That the torture of animals for scientific purposes is morally wrong, and should be totally abolished by law," was unanimously passed. The moral argument against vivisection was strongly brought out in all the speeches, that it is better for us who have other resources of the inward life, to bear our pains until they can be relieved by legitimate means, than that in the hope of relief we should allow the torture of animals, who have no such refuge from pain as is given to man.

THE meeting was well reported in the Daily News, the Daily Chronicle, and other papers, while by other leading Dailies it was ignored. The following is the greater part of a short leading article on the subject in the Daily News :—

The great meeting of the National Anti-Vivisection Society in St. James's Hall, last night, shows the strength and volume of the feeling that exists in this country against the vivisection of animals for the object of medical study and discovery. It is a cheap and easy matter to sneer at these people in this day of science triumphant. But no thoughtful or humane man, whatever his views on the necessities of science, can fail to feel the tremendous seriousness of the issue put before humanity. Human beings are in a position of high moral responsibility towards those whom they call the animals, and it is by no means clear that any medical gain to humanity really justifies the infliction of certain nameless tortures on animals. Great moralists, like Ruskin, have certainly held this view most strongly, and it was as a protest against the introduction of vivisection into Oxford that John Ruskin resigned from his Professorship in 1884. Huxley held the contrary view with equal strength, but he was primarily a physiologist, and he would have been left far behind by the claims of modern vivisectionists. . . . The whole subject is surrounded with a gigantic moral doubt. That doubt rests quite apart from the question of scientific utility into which the medical advocates of the practice naturally strive to draw us. For it is deep question—how far, for human profit, are we justified in torturing animals? Depend upon it, this question is not far removed from the problem how far we may torture human beings. It is an ominous sign that some of the boldest vivisectors abroad advocate both practices.

THE petition promoted by the British Union for the Abolition of Vivisection against the breach of trust involved in the use of the Brown Institution in South Lambeth, for purposes of vivisection, has already received over 20,000 signatures of people in all parts of the country. We understand that signatures can be received up to the 23rd inst., when a public meeting is to be held in St. James's Hall, after which the petition is to be presented to the Home Secretary.

THE tenth annual "At Home" at Winifred House, held last Saturday afternoon, gave a welcome opportunity to friends old and new of realising the happy spirit which pervades this Convalescent Nursing Home for Invalid Children (Mrs. Hampson's Memorial Home), and the admirable work which is being done. The Home, in Wray-crescent, Tollington-park, though surrounded by streets, is pleasantly situated, and has so much garden as to give the impression of a healthy openness, of which the children in fine weather have the full benefit. There are nineteen beds, which are at present all full, ten downstairs for the little ones who cannot walk, and nine upstairs. Many of our children wil be specially interested to hear that during the past ten years their contributions for the support of the Young Days Cot, which is one of those downstairs, have amounted to £269. The annual meeting of the Home is to be held on Monday afternoon, June 17, when the chair will be taken by Colonel Montefiore, who is the medical secretary of the Charity Organisation Society. The meeting will, no doubt, be held, as usual, at Dr. Williams's Library, Gordon-square.

THE May New Kingdom is a double number, devoted to the interest of the International meetings in Whit-week. There is a special pictorial supplement, and the number contains altogether thirty-eight portraits, large and small, of some of those who are to take part in the meetings. Of the greater number of these, biographical notes are added. The portraits of some of our foreign visitors are naturally of special interest.

WE are glad to see a note in the Indian Messenger of April 21 as to the health of the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams, to the effect that he was making good progress, and hoped to derive the full benefit from his homeward voyage, on which he was to start on April 30. At a meeting of the Executive Committee of the Calcutta University Institute, on April 8, the Rev. Dr. Macdonald in the chair, the following resolution was moved by Professor J. N. Das Gupta, B.A. (Oxon), and adopted unanimously:—"The Executive Committee of the Calcutta University Institute have heard with much regret of Mr. Fletcher Williams' serious illness. They wish to express to him their grateful sense of the value of the help he has given at many times and in various ways to the work of the Institute."

CHRISTIANITY, THE RELIGION OF THE INCARNATION.

II.—Critical.

In the earlier part of this paper an attempt has been made to show why the doctrine of the Incarnation should be regarded as the central one of Christianity, and in what sense that doctrine was to be understood; it remains in the following lines to adduce some additional considerations, and to meet certain objections both to the doctrine itself and to the particular term by which it has been designated.

To begin with the less important point. In one sense, names matter so little as to be indifferent, or nearly so, per se. What the discoverer of a new island, or a new planetoid, or a new chemical element, chooses to call his discovery, is a matter for his individual fancy to settle; he may, if he pleases, bestow his own name upon it, and nobody will object. But in another sense names matter a great deal—namely, when they have been habitually associated with certain things or ideas, when a whole mass of associations clusters round them; they then cease to be indifferent, and may neither be employed nor rejected without careful consideration.

If, then, it could be proved that in the present instance a totally fresh doctrinal departure had been made, one that could not be regarded as a legitimate development from the accepted doctrine of Christendom, it would be manifestly inexpedient to suggest a non-existent connection between the one and the other by the use of one and the same for both. To speak of God, e.g., as "incarnate" in the whole Universe, inanimate and animate alike, seems defensible only by an appeal to poetic licence. But in the case before us no absolutely fresh departure has been taken; the same doctrine of the Incarnation has actually been taught in the Church, centuries ago, by some who are regarded as masters of religious thought—Eckhart, Tauler, and the glorious author of the Theologia Germanica, a work of which so orthodox a man as Luther said that he owed to it more than to any other book, saving the Bible and St. Augustine; moreover, the same term has been used, in the same broad and spiritual sense, by acknowledged and revered teachers in our own communion. Whether it is admissible for an ordained member of an orthodox Church in the present day to give this or any other private interpretation to a doctrine the purport of which the formularies of that Church define in a certain way, is a question of interest to those whom it may concern; it does not concern those who have subscribed to no formularies, and who consider it the special prerogative of the liberal faith to disentangle what is true from what seems otherwise in the current creed, to sift the permanent from the temporary, to retain the kernel while rejecting the husk. We claim that the meaning in which we have used the term "Incarnation" is its essential meaning—namely, that the Divine Spirit which in varying degrees dwells in all God's children, dwelt in a supreme degree in Jesus Christ, who is therefore its chiefest revealer.

The word, then, while it is of course not indispensable, or a shibboleth, is one which we are not disposed to surrender; and our disinclination to part with it is increased by the observation that a simultaneous movement is in progress in many quarters, towards the very theory of the Incarnation which we are advocating. The term links us in a legitimate way with historical Christianity; it has the sanction of our own great teachers; and to repudiate it just as there seems a prospect of a reasonable and spiritual interpretation of it gaining ground in other Churches, likely to afford a common central idea, a bond of union, for Catholic and Protestant, Trinitarian and Unitarian alike, would be a disastrous mistake of the first magnitude.

What we need to be on our guard against—and not in this connection alone—is the temper which loves to emphasise differences, and would, for sheer delight in doing so, widen the gulf between ourselves and the rest of Christendom. To complain, in the present case, of the changing meaning in which terms are employed, is sheer literalism, and should be impossible to a student either of history or of evolution; such changes are inevitable, and the very word "God," used by all men in all ages, has probably in no two ages—possibly to no two men—covered and conveyed quite identical meanings.

But there is a special reason—the legitimacy of the term being now assumed—why we as a body should lay renewed and redoubled stress upon the doctrine of the Incarnation. The reason itself is patent, but to state it is by no means easy without unintentionally wounding some sensibilities, however one may strive to avoid doing this; nevertheless, it is time that the facts of the case, or what appear to be the facts, should be plainly set forth.

The position is briefly this, that with our changed conceptions of the Universe and of natural law our conceptions of God have been changing, and the naïve deism which consciously or unconsciously looked upon Him as a magnified Man is to us possible no longer. We feel with painful acuteness our inability to conceive of Him, and—in a less acute manner—the danger we are in of letting His reality slip away from our grasp; His unknowableness comes home to us with a novel force, and the result is bewilderment and spiritual dearth. The old arguments from design in Nature and so forth, which once were satisfying to the intellect at least, are so no more to the same extent; and with every wish that it were otherwise, it is impossible not to feel that in the case of many the former certainties have faded, or are in process of fading, the door being opened wide to agnosticism, ethical culture, and such like substitutes for religion. Without saying that our body of churches suffers more from this tendency of the times than others, it is not difficult to see why we should be specially open to its effects. We have no external authority to invoke; the mere circumstance that such and such a belief is taught by Scripture or enjoined by a church, impresses us little; what we are to believe, our conscience must approve, our reason acquiesce in. For this cause alone, those intellectual currents which have caused so much perplexity in other quarters of the religious world, were certainly not likely to leave ours untouched.

Let it, however, be admitted that all the questionings of our day can be satisfactorily answered by a true philosophy,—yet there is still all the difference between a philosophy and a religion; and the former cannot take the place of the latter. An intellectual creed, however faultlessly argued, is bound to lack vitality and motive power, for it makes religion "the acceptance of a proposition that is proved, instead of the consciousness of living relations to a living God personally recognised."—(Thom.) But without pursuing this line of thought, we come back to the fact that men are conscious to-day of greater difficulties in the way of "natural religion" than at one time; they "know that they cannot know" immediately, by the exercise of their faculties, an Infinite, Timeless, Unconditioned, Omnipotent, Omniscient, Omnipresent Being.

Now we are, as a religious communion, in this peculiar position—speaking of a very generally prevailing temper—that we have undertaken to show the possibility of such immediate, soul-satisfying knowledge of God as our faculties render impossible. We have in large numbers rejected the idea of a mediation of such knowledge, from a notion that to accept it would be somehow derogatory to our faculties. In other words, we have vastly over-estimated our powers; and by an irony of fate we have been encouraged in this over-estimate by some exceptional and prophetic souls among us who, having a clearer and less intermittent vision of God than the overwhelming majority of their fellow-men, generously credited the latter with their own capacities. But the average mortal is neither a Wordsworth nor an Isaiah, and neither in the domain of Nature nor in that of aspiration is He whom the heaven of heavens cannot contain, fully enough revealed to him. And thus it is to be feared that our claim—which the rest of Christendom has never credited—as to our ability to gain perfect access to God directly and immediately, has been in too many cases, not to say in all but exceptional cases, considerably in excess of the facts. We have proclaimed ourselves capable of breathing the highly-rarefied air of a highly-abstract theism—but the world professes to discover in us symptoms of spiritual dyspnœa; we have vaunted the sustaining qualities of the religious food on which we found it possible to subsist and flourish—only to have it hinted that our state exhibits the marks of spiritual inanition.

We have, in short—or many amongst us have—attempted an impossibility, and there is no dishonour in owning it; above all, there is no dishonour in reconsidering our position and trying to emerge from the barrenness, or what one of our writers has recently called, without encountering reproof, "the doctrinal poverty of liberal theism." If our attempt to transcend the limitations imposed upon us by the constitution of our minds has ended—as such attempts are bound to end—in comparative failure, may it not be our wisdom to abandon our non possumus attitude, and to seek for a means of fuller and readier access to God than is offered, e.g., in the ministry of Nature, or in what Martineau called "the faint oracles of our better selves"? May it not be possible that the collective Christian consciousness has not been utterly mistaken in finding that supreme means of approach to God, that supreme revelation of God, in the person of Jesus Christ?

The millions of Christendom testify with one voice that that revelation grows immeasurably clearer in his person than in aught or anyone besides—that no other kind of revelation, nor all of them together, suffice to give them that certain knowledge of God which they require for their souls' health. We, on the other hand, or a large proportion of us, seem to be merely bent on demonstrating the contrary—namely, that it is as easy to come into communion with God apart from Christ as through him, and we persist in the effort, in spite of the answer of results writ so large that he who runs may read them. Is it to be wondered at, if in circles outside our own the suspicion finds occasional expression that there must be just a touch of obstinacy in this immovable refusal to recognise that of all the channels to God Jesus Christ is the most direct, the most natural, the one that bears the most unmistakable marks of being providentially opened to us?

The recognition of this fact does not involve the denial of the existence of other channels, other means of revelation, though it involves their subordination to this one. To vary the metaphor, no one denies the illuminating power of a candle by declaring it to be inferior to that of an arc-lamp; while to reject the aid of the latter, and to grope one's way by the former, would hardly be a reasonable proceeding. Now what the Christian Church holds is, that Jesus Christ is the True Light, at whose appearance all others pale their ineffectual fires—even as moon and stars vanish when the sun rises in the Eastern sky. By the ascription to him of that exalted office and position, Jesus is not necessarily assigned an isolated place, or put into a category by himself; the difference between him and us is still one of degree, not of kind. On the other hand, his supremacy is certainly asserted, nor is it easy to understand how anyone claiming the name of Christian can call that in question. And this office and position of Revealer and Mediator Jesus can only hold by reason of the Divine Spirit dwelling in him in supreme measure—by reason of his being the supreme type of the Incarnation.

But is it true? The question is inevitable. "How do we know that the Spirit of God dwelt in this man in a unique degree? What are the evidences offered? What verification is there forthcoming for all this?" Two quotations, the one from Mr. Armstrong's "God and the Soul," the other from Mr. Thom's "Christ the Revealer," will answer these interrogations better than could be done in any other way.

We must give up the idea that we are to decide whether to believe a thing by considering whether it can be proved or not. For no truth whatever can be proved except by first making assumptions which cannot be proved. But we are not left without practical tests of truth which serve our purpose. What are these practical tests? The chief of them is: "Does it work?" . . . Suppose a man says that the granite road is solid; every step he makes upon it day after day, and year after year, more and more confirms his conviction. The doctrine works: and in the long run that will be the surest ground of his belief.—("God and the Soul," p. 51.)

What are the evidences of Religion when Jesus Christ shows us the Father? There are no evidences but a spiritual apprehension of the human Image of God's Goodness, and if we have no eyes to see that, testimony, miracles witnessed or miracles reported, will no more convince or convert us, than they converted the Jews who knew not the Father nor him, who could not see the Divine lineaments in the form of a Servant: it is not logical inference, but spiritual manifestation, the shining in our hearts, as the Apostle says, of the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of His Son. And thus all that can with truth be called Religious Evidences are our spiritual experiences themselves, which are either the direct action of God's Spirit upon ours, or the action of His Spirit upon us through the medium of the universe which is His mirror, or through the mediation of one of His children who is in fuller communion with Him than we are, and therefore manifests Him more mightily than we do—until the manifestation reaches its height in that Son of God and Son of Man in whom was the fulness of the prophetic spirit and the filial life. It is true that history has preserved for us the mightiest of these manifestations: we owe it to testimony that we are now in possession of the Life of Christ; but it is not within the province of testimony to prove that Life to be divine. . . . Our Lord, as of old, receives no testimony from man in this sense—God Himself is his witness when He finds for Himself a new access to each man's soul through His Image in His Son.—("Christ the Revealer," pp. 111, 112.)

The credentials of Christ are not of a nature to be established or affected by historical and textual criticism—they are neither confirmed nor invalidated by theories regarding the origin and date of the Gospels; he makes his appeal to our spiritual nature, not to our argumentative capacity, or to our faculty of settling thorny problems in history. Moreover, it cannot be too earnestly urged that there is a higher than merely historical truth—the "truth" of the shorthand report and the photograph. What makes the Fourth Gospel truer than the Synoptic records is not its quality, or lack, of accuracy, but the fact that it offers a spiritual interpretation of the life and personality of Christ, which the world has not yet outgrown. He may or may not have uttered the sayings "I and my Father are one" and "He that hath seen me, hath seen the Father"; but whether he did so or not becomes frankly immaterial, by the side of the much more important question, whether these assertions are true in themselves, i.e., true as statements of the relation of Jesus to God and man.

We have already admitted—we would even insist—that that question is not to be answered by appeals to external evidence: the consciousness of Christendom has answered it for itself, and it is not our wisest moods which will light-heartedly challenge that verdict. We refuse utterly to believe that it is a blind and clumsy accident of history which has singled out this man rather than any other to stand in the position of God's chief Revealer to His children; we find it easier and more rational to believe that mankind, in gladly acknowledging the supremacy and mediatorship of Christ and holding his name above every other, has obeyed a profound instinct, more powerful than logic, which teaches the soul to turn to where it will find fit sustenance. To-day, as nineteen centuries ago, men are touchingly eager to "see Jesus," because they divine his unique power to "show them the Father." That power was his because he was "full of the Holy Spirit"; and the religion which his personality initiated must remain for evermore the Religion of the Incarnation.

LITERATURE.

THIS is a painstaking and scholarly study of the life and teachings of the Apostle Paul. The biographers of Paul may be divided into three classes. The largest class consists of those who believe, or think they believe, what Paul believed: they write as disciples and followers. The next class consists of those who disbelieve, or think they disbelieve, in what Paul believed: they write as critics, and may be subdivided into the friendly and the unfriendly critic. The third class consists of those who, while disbelieving in Paul's form of doctrine, believe in the spirit of it: they write as friends, loving the man, confident of the inner truth of his teaching, and their aim is to reinterpret his doctrines in terms of modern thought.

In former days the first class had it all their own way. Paul was treated by Trinitarians as a Trinitarian and by Unitarians as a Unitarian. He was shown to have meant whatever his biographer believed. Then followed the historic school; the aim of that school was to be unprejudiced, to see things in white light, to be unmoved by liking or dislike. They wished to leave themselves and modern thought entirely out of account; their business was to see Paul and his times and to state what they saw. They felt the duty laid upon them to "nothing extenuate, nor set down aught in malice." Whether it was the life of Paul or Confucius or Socrates, emotion must be suppressed: there must be no attempt to improve the occasion and to use Paul or Socrates as arguments in doctrinal controversy to-day. We have to understand them as they were, and we cannot do this unless we are unselfish: there must be no attempt to make denominational capital out of them: the desire for sectarian aggrandisement has been the besetting sin of ecclesiastical biography. This self-less school has done a great work, and was a witness to the majesty of truth. It set before itself a very unpopular task. We are not attracted by the cold unimpassioned seeker after historic fact: he received little encouragement except from his own conscience. It needed a patience and a self-repression, and a resolution to write books which would not sell, that amounted often to heroism. That school was stronger twenty or thirty years ago than it is to-day. It was part of that scientific love of seeing facts for their own sake, and of following truth for its own sake, which led to great results in many directions. I am afraid it has to be admitted that men cared more then for seeing the thing as it is, the thought as it was, than they do now. The love of truth in this sense was more generally felt. At the same time this kind of truth-loving seems to us to have something materialistic in it. The scientific man was concerned with reading the story of Nature, and with explaining how one part of the story depended on, and arose out of, the next. He wanted to see each part as it was, and its relation to other parts; but he did not concern himself with it as an expression of the thoughts of God. The ecclesiastical historian of this school was concerned with reading the story of Christianity; he wanted to see and to describe what Paul thought, what John thought, and how Christian thought developed. But the question what was true in Paul's teaching or John's teaching did not concern him. He did not think of Paul and John so much as great human souls expressing under God's influence their highest thought and with a message for to-day: he looked at them as necessary links in an evolution of ideas.

* "Paul, the Man, the Missionary, and the Teacher." By Orello Cone. London: A. and C. Black. 1900. 10s. 6d.

Now to the third class of biographer, Paul is, first of all, a great personality, a great religious genius. To understand the form of his thought, you have to study him in relation to his times and as a link in a chain. But above all he is an impassioned human soul, expressing in his own way—a very different way from ours—feelings and thoughts which are permanently true. Behind changed methods of expression, behind the process of development, this biographer sees the common human soul, with the same needs, the same love, the same faith.

There is a good deal in Dr. Cone's book which is sympathetic as well as scholarly, but on the whole he must be placed amongst the friendly critics. He devotes long chapters to Paul's doctrines of the person of Christ, of Sin, of the Atonement, of Faith, and other things. These chapters are marked by great care and industry. He brings together Paul's various statements about sin or the atonement; he shows their logical connection, he shows their relation to Judaic thought, he quotes and discusses the opinions of other critics upon various points.

It is all very painstaking, very impartial, and very dull. We do not feel any sense of sin in ourselves as we read about it: we marvel how great men like Paul could have had such antiquated views: no doubt it is quite true that he had them, but then he had something infinitely more as well. We want a treatment of Paul's doctrine of sin and the atonement which, while it does not conceal Paul's mistakes or bigotries, makes us feel that here was a man like ourselves, only a great deal better and wiser: we want to see in his doctrine of the atonement something more than an interesting development of thought under Jewish influence: we want to see something in it which we can believe, something which is eternally true. Unless there is something human and divine about it, not merely Jewish or Greek, there is an end of all interest in such studies except for scholars. If the atonement meant something for Paul the man, not merely for Paul the Jew, it must mean something for us to-day. It is entirely right that a biographer should describe to us accurately, even at the risk of being dull, the system through which he expressed his thought. It is right that we should have Paul the Jew, the Pharisee, the Scholastic brought before us; but we want to see more of the man. No doubt there is a danger that in efforts to reinterpret doctrines like the Pauline Atonement or the Johannine Incarnation, we may misinterpret and put our own thoughts into them. Nevertheless, there is something to be interpreted. The position that completely false doctrines cannot work good, and that at the heart of the doctrines of all great good men, some permanent truth is to be found, this position seem to us irrefragable. We may be a long way yet from fully realising the eternal significance of the orthodox doctrines of the Incarnation or the Atonement; but we are upon the road if we feel that there really is some significance about them.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

THE Monthly Review contains an article by the author of "Pro Christo et Ecclesia" on "The Protestantism of Christ," which in a thoughtful study is described as the type to which all earnest religious reformers must conform. The protest of Jesus, it is said, was "The pushing of the large divine goodness against the narrowness of man's religion."

The existing church said, "Obey the letter." He replied, by precept and life, "The letter killeth"; and this phrase really sums up the whole of his opposition. But the Protestantism of Jesus was only a small, though essential, part of his message. The larger share of his time was given to preaching that "the Spirit giveth life," and the effect of his Protestantism can only be fully understood when considered as a part of the total effect of his whole teaching, as in the case of any other reformer. Two things only as regards this completer view can here be noted—that the extreme temperance of his Protestantism left the more room for his constructive work, and that the substance of that constructive work consisted in truths which, although they must eventually break up a dead letter, were on such a different level that they did not obviously clash with it. He hid in the heart of Judaism a life principle which must ultimately break the shell, not only of its formulae, but of all successive formulae as they are outgrown.

The test of this ideal is then applied to the Protestantism of Luther, and of the Oxford Movement and its Evangelical opposite, and the conclusion is:—

> The true heirs of Luther's gospel are those who look to the future rather than to the past for the perfect creed; who are able to work intensely, by prayer and by such form of expression as is given to them, to show forth the inexorable quality of love which will have nothing less, as the final word from any man, than holiness. Such men are, indeed, the true successors of the Jewish prophets, of every true reformer within the Church of Rome or in the ranks of historic Protestantism. They approach the example of Jesus. That example would seem to have little place in the hearts of men who make contradiction an abiding element in their religious zeal, and direct their chief efforts against things external which cannot defile.

Enthusiastic followers of Tolstoy will perhaps find a wholesome discipline in reading the article entitled "The Wrong Tolstoi," which contrasts the novelist's extreme theories with his own practice and declares:

> Tolstoi is not a Tolstoyite: he is an amiable character who has somehow strayed out of real life from the pages of "Tristram Shandy" or "The Caxtons."

The article is somewhat contemptuously written, but its criticisms ought to be faced. There is also a very sympathetic study of Charlotte Yonge, and an interesting article on Lady Hesketh and "Johnny of Norfolk," the cousin who took such devoted care of Cowper during the last years of his life. The illustrated article is by Professor Waldstein on "Recently discovered Greek Masterpieces," telling especially of the bronze "Hermes" recently found off the island of Cerigo, after an immersion of probably 2,000 years under the sea. Lovers of Greek art should by all means read this article.

To the Contemporary Dr. E. J. Dillon contributes a trenchant article on "Micawberism in Manchuria," describing but not explaining the puzzle of British policy in the Far East, and expressing his own view in these words:—"The partition of China, whether it takes the form of an annexation or of 'spheres of influence,' seems, so far as one can now judge, a measure fraught with disaster to all concerned. To qualify it from the ethical point of view is, of course, superfluous." Mrs. Bernard Bosanquet writes on "Cheap Literature," of the cheapest and most primitive sort, with sympathy for the readers, of whom the girls seem to have better matter provided for them than the boys, and with a wistful looking forward to something better. Other interesting articles are M. Jules Legrand's on "Church and State in France," and Mr. Richard Heath's study of "Christianity and the Democratic Ideal." The following striking passage is near the conclusion of this latter article:—

> Do the poor suffer simply for their own sins? Are they not rather the vicarious sufferers for the sins of society? So the Poor Man died because of the universal iniquity. Men were so bad, injustice so deeply rooted in human society, the canker so deep and far-reaching that a being like Jesus coming into the world must inevitably become its victim. He died for the sin of the world.
> The darkest hour is just before dawn, and so, notwithstanding the widespread oblivion of this fundamental truth, never for ages have men been so near the true appreciation of this aspect of Christ's death, and that because they are just beginning to understand the Democratic Ideal. That ideal involves human solidarity, and it is human solidarity that renders vicarious suffering able to heal and cleanse the wounds and sins of Humanity.

In view of the present education crisis the article on "The Education Muddle—and the Way out," by Mr. T. J. Macnamara, M.P., in the New Liberal Review, will be read with interest. It describes the effect of the Cockerton judgment, and shows how for years the Education Department had itself encouraged Higher-grade education, which is now declared to be beyond the province of the School Board. As to the need for a stronger public opinion in the matter of education in this country Mr. Macnamara says:—

> I see Great Britain floundering along, spilling her blood simply to open up new markets for her more highly equipped antagonists. I see nothing but failure for the future unless we promptly realise that nowadays the battle is not to the strong, but to the best educated.

The Fortnightly, also, has an article on the same subject, "A National System of Education," by Cloudesley Brereton, who pleads for the County Council as the best education authority. Other noteworthy articles are "Charlotte Mary Yonge," by E. N. Cooper; "Mr. George Murray Smith and the Dictionary of National Biography," by W. E. Garrett Fisher; "Newman and Sabatier," by Wilfrid Ward, calling attention to the striking parallel between Newman's "Development of Christian Doctrine" and Sabatier's treatment of dogma in his Esquisse d'une Philosophie de la Religion. The first article is by Sir Robert Hart on "China, Reform and the Powers," which, as we stated last week, also appears in French in the Revue de Paris.

AMONG THE MAGAZINES.

This month's Cornhill opens fitly with a tribute to the memory of the late Mr. George M. Smith, for so many years the head of the firm of Smith, Elder and Co., and the founder of the magazine, of which Thackeray was the first editor. Mr. Leslie Stephen, also a former editor, writes the tribute, speaking very highly of the distinguished publisher's great business faculty and true chivalry, which made co-operation with him so thoroughly satisfactory. Mr. Stephen knew him first when he was launching the Pall Mall Gazette, and looks back upon years of the most cordial friendship. A publisher is surely to be remembered with honour who enjoyed the unbroken friendship of Thackeray and his daughters, Browning, Millais, Matthew Arnold, and other distinguished authors. What Charlotte Brontë thought of him in his younger days not only her Life but her picture of Dr. John in "Villette" bears witness. He is remembered as a gallant English gentleman, a contemner of foppery and humbug, the ready champion of the weak, full of generous sympathy and the most sound-hearted affections. The great "Dictionary of National Biography," so admirably carried out and with such wonderful precision in the publication of its many volumes, will remain a monument of Mr. George Smith's honourable ambition and generous enthusiasm as publisher. Of this Mr. Leslie Stephen, who was the editor of the earlier volumes, writes:—

> Both the Cornhill and the Pall Mall Gazette brought him into connection with the ablest writers of the time, and provided for many of them an opportunity of gaining a wide audience. The most conspicuous proof, however, of a disinterested love of culture was given by the "Dictionary of National Biography." The first suggestion was entirely due to Smith himself; although his original plan (for a universal biographical dictionary) was too magnificent to be carried out. His part in the work was also the essential one. There would have been no difficulty in finding editors by the dozen; but if Smith had not been ready to incur a vast expenditure, and to take for remuneration only the credit of a good piece of work, another publisher could hardly have been found to take his place. Smith had shown that he could be a lavishly generous publisher in his dealings with Thackeray and George Eliot. In such cases, though a mean nature does not see it, generosity may also be the best policy; but in the case of the dictionary, the generosity was its own reward.

In the Sunday Strand will be found illustrated articles on the Royal Mausoleum at Frogmore and the new Bishop of London. The modern fiction in this magazine, we confess, seems to us much more useful and wholesome than the fiction Mrs. L. T. Meade is making out of the old Bible stories.

The Woman at Home opens with a first chapter on "Our popular Queen Consort," by Mrs. Sarah A. Tooley, author of the "Personal Life of Queen Victoria," and in the same number Miss Stoddart continues her "Chapters from the Life of Mr. Chamberlain," in which she has now reached the year 1885, giving this month a number of amusing portraits and a picture of an orchid-house at Highbury.

The Strand publishes an interesting letter of Lewis Carroll's, written in May, 1859, telling of a visit to the Tennysons at Farringford. In the evening, smoking in Tennyson's den, they got upon the subject of clerical duty, and he said, "he thought clergymen as a body didn't do half the good they might if they were less stuck up and showed a little more sympathy with their people. 'What they want,' he said, 'is force and geniality—geniality without force will of course do no good, but force without geniality will do very little.' All very sound theology, to my thinking." The proof sheets of the "Idyls" were lying on the table, but Tennyson would not let Mr. Dodgson look at them. There is also a short article on "A Cure for the Drink and Drug Crave," with a portrait of the late Dr. Keeley, the American surgeon who discovered the "Keeley Cure," and an account of his work. After twenty years' experience it is claimed that this system of treatment by regular hypodermic injections, and the taking of medicine for some four weeks, is an almost unfailing permanent cure for the deadly craving, and that it has in fact cured thousands of cases in America. For about nine years an institute has been at work in London, watched with the deepest interest by temperance reformers, and particularly by a committee, of which Canon Fleming is the chairman. Their verdict is that "success has been the rule and failure the exception."

LIFE'S PATHWAY.

Like a street of many turnings, so is Life;
Each turn bringing something new amid the strife
In life's busy thoroughfare.
Joy rubs shoulders with dull care,
Hope cheers hearts in deep despair
All the way.

In the morning, when the dawning opens bright,
And the gladness leaves the sadness of the night,
There are hearts that wildly beat
To the sound of many feet,
As they hurry in the street
All the way.

There is business to be done, there are battles to be won,
Ere the toilers seek their rest with the setting of the sun;
Yet the ever-trusting soul
Marches on towards the goal,
Though the clouds in tempest roll
All the way.

There is triumph in their song, as they bravely march along,
With the flag of common friendship floating o'er the mighty throng;
They are victors in the fight,
Though it ended with the night,
Yet their faith was for the right
All the way.

For bright hope is ever nigh, and truth can never die
While the star of glory glitters like a beacon in the sky;
Shining clearer, ever clearer,
Binding loving hearts still dearer—
Drawing men for ever nearer
All the way.

OBITUARY.

WILLIAM LOBLEY.

We regret to record the death of Mr. William Lobley, of Bradford, which occurred at his residence at Shipley on May 9. Mr. Lobley, who was in his seventy-first year, was a native of Horsforth. In 1860 he purchased a printing business, which is still carried on under the style of "W. Lobley and Sons," at Queen's-gate. As a young man he was very active, and took an intelligent interest in Liberal politics and other reforming movements. His political and municipal interest commenced nearly half-a-century ago, and practically up to the time of his death he was ever to the fore in all the public life of his party. Twenty-three years ago, after he had served for eight years as hon. secretary to the Liberal Association, he was appointed paid secretary and registration agent, arrangements being made by which he could continue at the head of his own business at the same time. Mr. Lobley held this important political appointment continuously, to the great advantage of local Liberalism in all times and circumstances, until, feeling the advance of age, he retired about a year ago. Upon the occasion of his retirement his political friends made notable recognition of the services which he had rendered to them—at a not inconsiderable sacrifice of personal interests—by presenting him with an illuminated address and a gift of £1,000. In 1876 Mr. Lobley entered the Town Council, and served successively as Councillor and Alderman until 1895. He left the Council with a record of municipal work which was quite in keeping with the high reputation which he had acquired as a political organiser. Mr. Lobley was a Unitarian by religious conviction, and attended Chapel-lane Chapel. He was one of the oldest of the local members of the Manchester Unity of Odd Fellows, the oldest Past Grand Master of the district, and a trustee, and probably the oldest member of the Commercial Lodge. He was one of the founders, and was for many years on the Committee of the Bradford Friendly Societies' Medical Aid Association. Mr. Lobley's death was due to an attack of acute pneumonia. If he had lived a few days longer he would have celebrated his golden wedding. The funeral took place on Monday at the Undercliffe Cemetery. A short service was conducted at the house by the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, who also officiated at the cemetery. In the course of a brief address at the graveside he said those who were most intimately acquainted with their departed friend would recall his many amiable qualities and sterling virtues. He was a man of strict integrity, one who had a very high sense of his duty, and, as such, he would be gratefully remembered by a very large circle of acquaintances. He was a man of many gifts, some of which he had carefully cultivated in spite of all hindrances. As a youth he availed himself of every opportunity of self-improvement within his reach, and thus he qualified himself for useful citizenship. Whatever his hand found to do he did it with his might. This was especially the case with his work in connection with the great party to which he belonged. To him the principles which he professed were matters of profound conviction, and he advocated them with a consistency and devotion which were beautiful to witness. He was often called upon to do work of great difficulty, but all parties would agree that he attended to the duties of his office with clean hands and a pure heart. He was a good citizen, a true patriot, and a faithful friend. Might it be their earnest prayer that the rising generation would have the grace to imitate his love of truth and justice and his devotion to the public good.

MRS. E. HARROWIN.

By the death of Mrs. E. Harrowin, which took place on Saturday last, the congregation of the New Gravel Pit Church, Hackney, have lost another of their old and valued members. In her youth Miss Johnson, as she then was, was intimately associated with the day-school for girls connected with the church. She is well remembered as its zealous and devoted teacher, whose gentle and refining influence was deeply felt by all who came in contact with her. In the year 1864 she left England to be married, and the twenty-two years of her married life were spent in Australia—at Melbourne. After the death of her husband in 1886 she returned to Hackney to keep house for her widowed brother, the late Mr. H. Johnson, and then took her place as one of the active workers of the congregation, and was ever to be found where sympathy and kindness were needed. She may be said to have conducted the mothers' meetings to the end, for within a few days of her death she wrote a letter to the mothers, and on the very day she died she had made arrangements for a tea to be given them. In a modest and retiring manner she helped and comforted many who will sorely miss her brave spirit from among them, and her purse was always open to the poorer members of the Friendly Society, who frequently mistook her private charity for benefits conferred by the society. Mrs. Harrowin had no children. Her loss is mourned by two nephews, Messrs. Henry and Alfred Johnson, and by all who had the privilege of being admitted to her staunch and genuine friendship.

EDMUND MILLS.

THE death took place at his residence, Whalley-road, Accrington, on May 8, of Mr. Edmund Mills, Chairman of the Unitarian congregation in that town. He was born at Bury, and brought up as an Independent. He removed in early manhood to Accrington. There he became a Unitarian, and in company with a few others helped to gather a Unitarian congregation together in the face of many difficulties. He was a trustee of the building, and a representative of the congregation on the Committee of the North and East Lancashire Unitarian Mission. For many years he rendered excellent service in the Sunday-school. He retired some five years ago from the responsible post that he had held in the district, and it was hoped the church might have had the advantage of his wise counsel for many years, but an unexpected affection of the heart caused his sudden decease. Mr. Mills was much respected in the town, and was a trustee of the Mechanics Institution. He leaves a widow, three daughters, and three sons, of whom the Rev. Herbert V. Mills, of Kendal, is well known. The interment took place on Monday, the Rev. Walter H. Burgess officiating.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

"Love Your Enemies."

I THINK it would be difficult for most of you to find your enemies—real enemies, I mean. Certainly, if you are happy and good-natured at this moment, it would be impossible. Indeed, I don't believe that you have any. So how can you love them?

All the same, there are times when you think you have enemies, and it is about these imaginary enemies I want to say something. Our enemies, of course, are those who wish or do us harm. And we do sometimes imagine this of other people, and they seem to us our enemies.

First of all, there are the older people who won't let us do what we have set our hearts on doing at this moment. "No," mother says, "I can't let you play with Percy this afternoon," or "I can't take you to the Hippodrome on Saturday," or "I don't want you to go to the river to swim." How trying that is! Mother has really the best of reasons. She is thinking of your good all the time. But you are angry, and you say, "Mother never lets me do what I like. She doesn't want me to have any fun. I wish I hadn't any mother." For the moment mother seems your "enemy."

Then there are the other people who insist on our doing what we don't want to do. The teacher who gives us such hard lessons, and will have the exercise-book written neatly, and makes us stay after school hours when our work isn't done properly. What a disagreeable person he is! He is our enemy surely. We know he isn't so hard on any one else. He is always on the look out to catch us. It must be that he dislikes us, and does all this on purpose to vex us. Or perhaps it is the master who is trying to train us to do our work thoroughly and well. It is very unpleasant to have so much fault found with us. We don't see any need for being so particular. The master must have a spite against us, must dislike us. He is our enemy. And already dislike to him springs up in our minds.

Another kind of enemy is sometimes found among our schoolmates or playmates. It is the one who succeeds better than we do, the one who takes the prizes we hoped to win, or the one whom everyone is praising and holding up as our example—for being so pleasant-tempered, or bright, or industrious, or orderly; or who is so popular with the other children, and whose very presence makes us feel small, and dull, and left out. All this painful feeling we carry over to this other boy or girl who is the occasion of it, and it seems to us that he enjoys humiliating us and making us feel inferior to him, that he does it on purpose, and we begin to dislike him and think he dislikes us and is "our enemy."

Then—and this is, perhaps, commonest of all—there is the somebody we don't like, we don't know why, but we have to find some excuse for it, and the readiest one is, that he doesn't like us. And we really make ourselves believe it. Perhaps we are conscious of having said something unkind about him, or done some unkind thing to him. Perhaps we only want an excuse for doing one. Then we say to ourselves that he is "our enemy," and this seems to justify us in doing him some harm. It seems to justify us in seeing a bad motive in everything he does, and the worse we can imagine him to be the more justified we seem to be in hurting or vexing him.

I read the other day about a little boy who came crying to his mother because Johnny had hit him. "Well," said his mother, "did you hit back?" "Yes," said the little boy, "I did hit him back first."

I am afraid we often do the hitting back first. We begin, and when the return blow comes, we say, "Oh, what an enemy! What an offensive, hostile, resentful person this is! Unless I get rid of him there will be no living in peace for me." And it is we ourselves who have made this enemy.

If we notice who it is that we call "our enemy," every now and then, and for the time feel to be our enemy, we shall find he is, generally, one or the other of these three kinds—some one who won't let us do what we like; some one who gets ahead of us; some one whom we don't like, or have injured in some way.

Now there is one comfort in children's enmities: they are very short-lived, and he who is the "enemy" of to-day may be the friend of to-morrow. But while they last they make us unhappy, and sometimes ill-natured, perverse, and wretched.

And though the enemies we have been thinking of are imaginary enemies, the best way to vanquish them is Jesus' way—by loving them. The heart full of love, which will dissolve real enmities, will dissolve these fancied ones. In thinking kindly of people, we are sure to think more justly of them. All this imagined offence melts away. We see they are not trying to harm us. We see that they are not so exacting and unreasonable, and are not doing things on purpose to vex us. We see that the one who gets ahead of us often does not do so out of spite. We see that the person who now feels unkindly to us became so through our fault. And then the anger and sullenness and ill-will melt out of our hearts as a fogbank does when the sun shines through it. And our enemies?—why we see that there are none.

A poor insane woman came to me the other day and told me about her enemies. Her whole family were her enemies, and her old friends. Everybody was her enemy. And it was terribly sad to see a life thus darkened—living in a world of "enemies." But everyone could see that this poor woman was under illusions, and pitied her. To be insane is simply to be under illusions, and to think everyone one's enemy must surely be the worst of all illusions. We go a little way in that direction when we let ourselves think of others as our enemies. To think it leads us to believe it. To believe it leads us to act on it. To act on it may make them so. Try to think of others as your friends. Try to believe them so. And, acting on that belief, you will make them so. "Love your enemies." C. A. F.

MINISTRY TO THE POOR.

THE annual meeting of the London Domestic Mission, of which we published a report last week, called attention to a religious work of the very highest kind, which commands the devoted service, not only of the men whose whole life is given up to ministry among the neglected poor, but in greater or less degree of a large number of our people who help in the manifold activities which centre in the Missions.

The Domestic Mission Society, established in London sixty-six years ago, has at present charge of three stations—the George's-row Mission, in the East, under the care of the Rev. F. SUMMERS; the Bell-street Mission, Edgware-road, under the Rev. B. KIRKMAN GRAY; and the Rhyl-street Mission, Kentish Town, under the Rev. W. WILSON. Similar work is done at the Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, under the Rev. W. G. CADMAN; at the Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel, under the Rev. FREDERIC ALLEN; and at Durning Hall, Limehouse, under the Rev. JOHN TOYE; and now we are told that this is the work which must be done also at Bermondsey, unless that post of duty is to be abandoned.

If any of our readers doubt the value of such work, or the urgency of its claim upon their practical sympathy and support, we ask them to procure a copy of the last annual report of the Domestic Mission Society, which may be had at Essex Hall, and to read the reports of the three missionaries. They will then see how much is being done to carry the influences of earnest religious faith and human sympathy to the poor in the most needy quarters of the city, to bring some touch of brightness into dreary lives, to ease heavy burdens, to give fresh strength and courage to those who are baffled in what too often seems a hopeless fight, to train the children and young people in useful knowledge, in pleasant occupations, and to afford wholesome recreation and helpful companionship to young and old alike. They will then see also how great is the variety of activity centred in the Missions and in how many ways people of ordinary capacity, if only they have hearty good-will and a little self-devotion, that will bend itself to humble tasks, can lend a helping hand.

The constant cry of our Missionaries is for more helpers, to extend the beneficent influence which the Missions are so well able to exert; and this year there is a special appeal for more recruits to throw in their lot as friends among the poor, to strengthen the humanising forces, which simply by being there must defeat the brutalising influences of dreary city life. Thus Mr. SUMMERS deplores the increase of Hooliganism in his district, and tells of his efforts to counteract it by means of the gymnasium; and Mr. KIRKMAN GRAY has a similar lament to make, as will be seen from the following passage in his report :—

> My work as a religious teacher has been rendered more difficult this year by the working of an evil influence in English society from which we have not escaped. There are different judgments on the policy of the South African war; but the bad temper it has let loose at home is only too obvious. There has been an increase of rowdiness in the streets; a craving for excitement and tales of carnage in literature and on the stage; a disinclination for serious interests or even quiet enjoyment; a carnival of the unruly elements in human nature. The evil has been accentuated in this district by its proximity to the route of the various military processions. This unhealthy excitement has affected us in spite of the fact that opinion in the district has been largely opposed to the war. But the influence I speak of is more subtle than opinion, and has worked as a bad leaven in many against their own judgment. It is hard for the Christian spirit to penetrate where this violent spirit is prevalent. But the increased need has been an added incentive to preach the spiritual service of God, which must be in gentleness, without self-seeking; and which demands a personal consecration of the individual life to the Prince of Peace. This is the message I have tried, with however little success, to deliver and explain.

Mr. GRAY at the annual meeting made a very earnest appeal for help in the work of his Boys' Club. The Men's Club, as will be seen from his report, is now well established, and he has also formed a club for lads of from fifteen to eighteen, in which, at that most critical period of their growing life, there is an opportunity for young men of character and education to do inestimable good, by joining them in frank companionship, as friends and elder brothers, to share the interests of their reading and their games, to enlarge their range of thought and sympathy, and to give out of their own store, chiefly in unconscious influence, what will help to build up honourable and true men. Then in addition to the work of the club, Mr. GRAY stated that he could not at present do anything for these lads on Sunday, unless another teacher would volunteer, since at present he was occupied with a class of somewhat younger lads. One other need he mentioned, the easiest of all to be supplied, for the lads' club, and that was £10 to £15, to secure for them a proper cricket ground for the summer.

We have referred to this special need and opportunity, as a typical instance out of many. It is the same appeal as was made by Mr. CLASSON DRUMMOND at the Mansford-street annual meeting for his Boys' Club there, and we doubt not that it may be applied in Liverpool and Manchester and Birmingham, and wherever in our large towns such work among the poor is being carried on. Would that in every such instance this appeal might reach one or two of our young men, and persuade them to give up perhaps one evening in the week to this work, which is such a straightforward kind of unselfish service, and in a way so easy, simply to go down and be friends with those who are in such need of friends.

Others, who might be persuaded to choose for themselves the great happiness to be found in such genuine helpfulness, but do not feel that the Boys' Club is exactly their place, if they will consider the reports, will see that no one is left out, and that their own work is certainly waiting for them. And for the rest, to them comes the one constant appeal for more funds, an appeal not to be answered grudgingly, or as though it were for want of anything better to give, but as Mr. WICKSTEED so well said at the annual meeting, with a thankful sense of the good work which money so given must represent. But the gifts must be abundant, and very largely increased above the measure of former years, if this great work is to be adequately maintained. It goes to the heart of our religion, it tests the sincerity of our faith and our self-sacrifice. In London it is now asked, must Bermondsey be abandoned for the lack of £1,000, and an additional income of £300? And for the continuance in full efficiency of the established missions the same appeal needs to be pressed home. We are unwilling to believe that for such religious work, up to the measure now set before our community, funds cannot be secured, or that if the matter is clearly put and the appeal rightly made there will not be such a response as will make retreat impossible, and retrenchment needless, because the flood-tide of generous and unselfish giving will carry forward the work of our ministry among the poor to a position of security and effectiveness hitherto unattained.

A SUMMER PLEA.

"WHEN thou makest a feast, call not thy rich neighbours, but bid the poor," said Jesus. Oft heard, not often heeded, the behest becomes imperative sometimes to those who are brought into close contact with poverty, and see for themselves its worst wants. And since much good is left undone, no less than evil wrought, "for want of thought," and much benevolence waits only for the practicable way, it is for those who see the need to make it known. Coming from stifling streets after a warm summer noon to cool rooms and shady gardens, one cannot help thinking what possibilities of kindness lie open to the owners of them—only neglected, perhaps, because unthought of.

There are generous men among the rich, who

> Give up their parks some dozen times a year
> To let the people breathe.

And summer outings and treats are important items in the annual programme of every charitable institution; but these holidays come seldom, and then do not always fall to those who need them most, nor do they always achieve the results desired. Gathered by the score or the hundred from neighbouring streets, and packed for transport like a freight of cattle, the guests carry with them all too home-like an atmosphere. And we want to give them change of thought as well as change of scene. Many are toiling, week after week, month after month, from morning till night, in the same small dingy room, always at the same monotonous task, thinking the same thoughts every day, or not thinking at all, their minds inevitably narrowing for lack of larger interests and more beautiful surroundings. Is an annual outing the most that we can give them of the bountiful summer? Does a crowd of neighbours enhance their enjoyment of fragrant meadows and blossoming hedgerows?

Take them into an ordinary suburban garden, two or three only at a time, and let them rest in the shade of the trees for awhile, breathing the fragrance of blowing roses, and watching the birds flitting about in the branches overhead. They need no entertainment. "It is like Paradise!" they will tell you, just to be delivered for a few hours from the noisy street, the heated atmosphere, the sordid sights of the city, and transported to this cool lawn. They appreciate everything: the glint of blue sky through leafy branches, the daisied grass, the sweet air, and no less the luxury of garden chairs, the novel daintiness of china teacups, and the flavour of good tea: above all, the courtesy of the hostess who serves them herself will hearten and cheer them and win their ready gratitude. And through many a weary month to come, they will cherish the memory of that summer day and its quiet joys. School treats and outings, at the best, cannot be frequent. They involve considerable expense and trouble of organisation, which is usually borne by a few. But this modest hospitality is possible to the majority of suburban householders, and, surely, to some who would willingly make trial of it. "Hospitality is good," said William Penn, "if the poorer sort are the Subjects of our Bounty: else too near a Superfluity." In the relation of host and guest, moreover, rich and poor come together in free and friendly intercourse—to their mutual advantage. Poverty has its own graces, as the cold Alpine snow its flowers.

> A patience learned of being poor:
> Courage, if sorrow come, to bear it:
> A fellow-feeling that is sure
> To make the outcast bless his door.

In these things the poor are richer than those of ample means, and set an example. And to these bondservants of society how cheering is the friendly converse with one of gentler manners and more cultured mind, one whose influence brings something fresh and pure into their lives, one who is neither too high to sympathise with them, nor too low to help. Such friendship wins their confidence and gratitude, as almsgiving can never do: it satisfies a deeper need: to retain it they will try to do and be their best. Is not this the truest charity?—

> Not what we give, but what we share,
> For the gift without the giver is bare.

Many benevolent people, we are told, only reluctantly withhold their gifts because warned of the evils of almsgiving, and unable themselves to go on errands of mercy among the poor. Has it ever occurred to such that they might sometimes open their own bright homes and gardens to the guests that Christ commended to their care? Not indiscriminately: not to beggars from the street: but to those whom every city missionary and visitor would know to send. We are always visiting their homes: why should they not sometimes see ours? This, too, were a domestic mission, and those who try the experiment will not regret it, but find an added brightness in the summer days, and an ever-widening sphere of quiet service. K. M. W.

ST. ANTONY OF PADUA.

A TRAVELLED friend last summer, returning from a sojourn of some months in France, reported among other interesting observations the great development (the "boom" he called it) of the worship of St. Antony of Padua. The saint was in particular the restorer of lost property. An American lady, staying in the same pension with my friend near Lyons, missed some money. She was a Protestant, but a Catholic resident in the same house induced her to consult St. Antony. "Go to such and such a chapel, say this prayer, and put something in the box" (in this case, two francs). The next day a servant in the house confessed the theft, and the lady was on the high road to conversion.

It was with this story in my mind that I entered, one Saturday evening, the great church at Padua where the saint lies buried. Italian Gothic presents many unusual features to the eye accustomed to the cathedrals of France or England, the influence of classical forms being never far away. But here was a quite fresh combination of Oriental elements. Over nave and transepts and choir rose a startling group of domes, and the usual campanile was replaced by a pair of lovely minarets appropriately guarding the eastern end. The north transept was converted into the chapel of the saint. Costly marbles, richly sculptured reliefs illustrating his life, votive offerings, superbly wrought vessels for the altar service, magnificently chased lamps, everything that art and affection could suggest, were there. And all around was a kneeling throng, while behind the shrine the crowd pressed slowly in with passionate devotion to kiss the spot that was nearest to the holy bones. A fortnight of special pilgrimage, promising peculiar graces to those who undertook it, was nearing its close, and the multitudes were increasing every day. They kneeled that evening in all the chapels of the great church; they patiently waited in rows beside the confessional boxes; they bought "sacred objects" in the main cloister, or subscribed to St. Antony's Messenger, a little monthly journal dedicated to this special cult; while in an inner and smaller cloister sat the "Pilgrimage Committee" dealing with every sort of difficulty or need.

Who was Saint Antony? I found his story in a little popular life prepared a few years ago for the seventh centenary of his birth at Lisbon in 1195. He was of Portuguese family, his real name being Ferdinand Bulham (sic) or Bulhrens, which enabled his enthusiastic biographer to connect him with the famous crusading knight Godfrey of Bouillon (about as reasonably as I might derive the name of the beloved Bristol surgeon which I happen to bear from the tyrant Ezzelino to be hereafter mentioned). It was the custom for the boys of noble Portuguese families to be educated under the care of monks, and the young Ferdinand manifested such early piety that by 1207 he was already destined for the priesthood, and allowed to wear the habit of the Augustinians in the monastery of St. Vincent near Lisbon. From St. Vincent he was transferred to the famous monastery of the Holy Cross at Coimbra, and there his first miracle took place in the cure of a young brother who was possessed by a demon. Days of ardent zeal were devoted to study and meditation, until his enthusiasm was eagerly kindled by the news of the martyr deaths of some of the missionaries sent to Morocco by Francis of Assisi. Near to Coimbra was a convent of the Frati Minori dedicated to St. Antony; Ferdinand was permitted to join it and assume the religious name of its patron; and in December, 1220, he was allowed to set out for Africa. His sufferings from fever led his superiors to send him back to Europe. Shipwrecked in Sicily on the way, he started for Assisi to present himself before the founder of the Order, and thus attended the famous Chapter held in 1221, at which further missions were arranged. Then followed a long period of austerity till he was summoned to a provincial chapter of the Order held at Forli in Lent, 1222. A number of Dominicans were present as guests, and the Superior entreated one of them to preach. But they all refused, and the young Antony was suddenly bidden to the task. At first he modestly sought to excuse himself, but at length, in deference to his vow of obedience, he began to speak.

His success marked out his future course. First in the Romagna, afterwards in Provence, he preached from city to city, converting the indifferent and hostile, winning back the sinner, and lifting up the down-trodden and oppressed. Driven out by the heretics of Rimini, he went down to the shore and summoned the fishes to listen to him, and, lo! they gathered at his call to praise their Creator, formed a semi-circle round him with the small ones in front, and the rest in increasing stature behind, and rendered him the hearing which men had denied. A certain Bonvillo mockingly said that he would believe if his mule, after three days' fast, would do reverence to the consecrated Host instead of attending to a bundle of fodder. Needless to say that when Antony produced the holy wafer the obedient animal dropped upon its knees, and the furious Patarine was converted into a fervent Catholic.

After the death of Francis in October, 1226, Antony returned from Provence to attend the Chapter at which a new head for the Order was appointed, and in the next year betook himself to Padua, then "dominated by the Patarine heresy." There his preaching produced the same results. Well might it, for as the saint was seen praying in solitude, rays of heavenly light enveloped him and shone all around; and lo, the Holy Child threw his arms around his neck, and embraced him tenderly. Supported with these heavenly aids, he did not shrink from presenting himself before Ezzelino, who had laid waste and plundered the fair lands of Padua, and rebuked him severely for his cruelties; then, essaying to overcome him with humility, he sought to comfort him in his sins and persuade him to lead a new life, till the proud noble—to the amazement of his courtiers—threw himself at the friar's feet, beseeching him to intercede for his pardon with God. "I saw such a light come forth from him," he said afterwards, "that whatever he had commanded me I would have done it." But the moment passed, and the heavenly light was seen by Ezzelino no more. Yet such remembrance had he of the saint, that when in 1237 he captured the city, and (as an inscription on the spot relates) doffed his helmet and in a transport of triumph kissed the gate now humbly opened to him, he had respect to the dead teacher, and allowed the Frati to proceed undisturbed with the vast shrine which they were already rearing over his bones. For the intensity of his toil soon wore out the earthly tabernacle, and on June 13, 1231, Antony followed his beloved leader into the higher life. The brethren laid him in the little Franciscan church of Santa Maria. A vast concourse—nobles, clergy, and people—marched bare-footed after the bier. The cripples who touched the marble sarcophagus which received the remains, arose and walked; the blind saw, and the deaf heard. The Church was not slow to recognise such merits, and in less than twelve months Antony was duly canonised by Gregory IX. The Frati soon took steps to rebuild their church on a larger scale; and in the mingled forms of its architecture, the soaring domes and aspiring minarets, the chaplet of chapels around the eastern end, they unconsciously blended the oriental and trans-Alpine interests of their saint.

And to-day the cultus of the saint is very much alive indeed. Early on the last Sunday in April the streets were crowded. In Padua it is enough to put up at the corners "Al Santo"—to the saint; no further direction is needed. Two thousand more pilgrims had come in during the night, and multitudes were flocking to the church. The men were mostly dressed in stout peasants' cloth; the women wore shawls or lace over their heads; the richer had coral necklaces, reminding one that the Adriatic was not far off. The men all carried large umbrellas; so did many of the women, and little bundles tied up in handkerchiefs. They hurried past the massive sarcophagus of Antenor, son of Priam of Troy, founder of Padua, under its Gothic canopy: what was Antenor to them or to their saint? The huge church was thronged from end to end. Its noble monuments looked down on innumerable village groups, easily marked by small peculiarities of headdress or costume. Six different masses were being said at once. The great nave, the aisles, the chapels, were crowded with kneeling worshippers. The bare white-washed spaces of the cathedral were deserted. In the long aisle-less nave of the Eremitani a preacher roared his sonorous platitudes to a scattered handful of listeners. Even the magnificent sanctuary of St. Justina, "the fifth biggest church in Italy" (as the custodian of the Observatory proudly remarked to me in the afternoon), was almost empty, though one transept holds the sarcophagus of St. Matthew and the other that of St. Luke, to say nothing of St. Justina herself and her fellow-martyrs. A few of the more cultivated pilgrims looked in at the little chapel in the arena of the ancient amphitheatre where Giotto's frescoes still silently teach the exquisite purity and simplicity of early Italian art; they glanced around, and departed. Not there were the precious influences which they sought. Alone, probably, of all the multitude, I went up into the Hall of the brotherhood or guild of St. Antony, where Titian had not disdained to paint the wonder of an infant suddenly endowed with speech by the saint to convince a father suspicious of his wife's fidelity, or that other wonder of the restoration of the foot which a penitent youth cut off in too literal obedience to the Gospel-word. These marvels were no modern creation, but their artistic display had ceased to interest or quicken. What was alive in this cultus came through the Church. Busy priests moved to and fro among their flocks; they came with them and went away with them (not always, however—I saw one, stout and genial, arrive breathless the next morning at the station just as a whole trainful was steaming out. "E partito," cried the porter, and asked for his blessing), and the whole proceedings were evidently part of a kind of revival in the districts from which the pilgrims were drawn. But who could see those silent groups waiting to confess, who could look upon the kneeling crowds, and think of the sorrows and joys, the sins and endeavours, locked up in each memory, without feeling that there was more here than any priests could compass? Deep beneath the whole, dim and inarticulate, beat that mighty life to which the Catholic Church has known so well how to give expression. How will the religion of the future provide for this? It is easier to ask the question than to answer it. The one thing which we may not do is to dismiss the whole as foolish credulity or juggling superstition.

J. ESTLIN CARPENTER.

To conquer any evil desire or tendency, we need to cultivate a noble one. We bring light into a room not by closing the blinds to the darkness, but by letting the light in. He who is consecrated to lofty aims and is untiring in the pursuit of them, is little tempted by the painted dust and ashes of the apples of Sodom.—

THE REV. CHARLES W. WENDTÉ.

WE published last week a sketch of the Rev. S. M. Crothers, D.D., one of the delegates of the American Unitarian Association to the New Century and International meetings in Whit-week; and we are glad now to be able to add an account of the other delegate of the American Association, the Rev. Charles W. Wendté, who comes to us as an old friend, and bearing a double responsibility, as he is also secretary of the International Council.

Mr. Wendté is a native of Boston, Mass., where he was born in 1844, two years after Channing's death, and the year before Theodore Parker began to preach in Boston. His parents were German emigrants from Hanover (so that the name is to be pronounced as two syllables, and the W as V). The father died early, and the mother, a woman of unusual energy and talent, supported herself and her two boys, of whom Charles was the elder, by teaching her native language. Among her pupils were Theodore Parker, O. B. Frothingham, C. T. Brooks, George Ticknor, and J. L. Motley, and Prescott's daughters.

Young Wendté, at the end of his school days in Boston, studied for a year at Hanover, and thus early made his first voyage to Europe. Then unwilling to be any longer dependent on his mother for support, he gave up his hopes of entering Harvard College, and became a clerk in a wholesale woollen house in Boston.

At the end of three years his health suffered, and his mother, alarmed, with her customary decision of character, moved with her sons to California, arriving in San Francisco, viâ Panama, in May, 1861. There Thomas Starr King was at the height of his influence as a Unitarian minister and a patriotic citizen of the Union. Through his interest, Charles Wendté was appointed by the new Governor Secretary to the Board of Port Wardens, and he subsequently became a teller in the newly-established Bank of California. The friendship and example of Starr King had a profound influence on his character, and finally determined him to devote his life to the ministry. The early death of his friend and inspirer added a new consecration to his purpose, and in 1866, with health re-established by five years in California, he returned to the East and entered the Harvard Divinity School, graduating in 1869. During his years of study he supported himself mainly by acting as German tutor under the University professors.

On the completion of his course he went, at the instance of Robert Collyer and others to Chicago, to undertake a missionary movement in that city, which is now represented by All Souls' Church. The great fire of 1871 happily left Wendté's home untouched, and he was able to offer an asylum to the Collyers and other sufferers, and in the trying winter which followed he was untiring in his efforts for the relief of the distress.

In 1876 the inclemency of the Chicago climate led to his removal to Cincinnati, where for seven years he exercised a prosperous and influential ministry. In addition to his church work, he established in 1880 the People's Sunday Afternoon Lectures in Pike's Opera House, which, with their great audiences, have been ever since a wholesome influence in the life of the city. Wendté threw himself eagerly into charitable work, helping to organise the Associated Charities of Cincinnati; he became a member of the School Board and a trustee of Antioch College, and was widely known as a lecturer.

In 1883 he accepted the pastorate of the newly-erected Channing Memorial Church at Newport, R.I., whence three years later he went again to California as Missionary Superintendent, appointed by the American Unitarian Association. There, with amazing energy and enthusiasm, and great organising ability, he accomplished so much that in four years instead of six there were twenty Unitarian churches on the Pacific coast, and in Oakland, which he made his headquarters, a specially fine church was built, thoroughly organised, not only as a religious home, but a hive of week-day industries for the public welfare. Eleven years of these incessant labours again told upon Mr. Wendté's health, and hoping for relief from the strain he first accepted a pastorate at Los Angeles, but was soon obliged to relinquish the charge, and in 1898 he again came to Europe for change and rest.

Mr. Wendté is now settled at Newton Centre, Mass., a suburb of Boston, and last year took a prominent part in organising the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers, of which he became the secretary.

In this country Mr. Wendté has hitherto, perhaps, been best known as the editor of popular hymn and tune books, to which he has made original contributions both of music and verse. "The Sunny Side: A Book of Religious Songs for the Sunday-school and the Home," was first published in 1875, while Mr. Wendté was still at Chicago. Of this popular book he was the chief editor, and it has been very widely used. His residence at Newport gave leisure for a larger and more independent work, and in 1886 he published "The Carol: A Book of Religious Songs for the Sunday-school and the Home," which includes also services for Sunday-school worship and the Festivals of the Church. Last year Mr. Wendté added to his services in this direction by the publication of "Jubilate Deo: A Book of Hymns and Tunes for Young and Old" (G. H. Ellis, 272, Congress-street, Boston). This book was brought out under the auspices of the Young People's Religious Union, and contains a concluding section of "Songs of Joy and Social Duty." While its first aim was to meet the needs of young people, it is also adapted to congregational use, and hopes for a welcome in the home circle, and in connection with outdoor meetings and mission and reform work in general. It contains many fine modern hymns. As an example of Mr. Wendté's own verses we may quote here his "Patriot's Prayer":—

O Lord, our God! thy mercy led our fathers,
Pilgrims of faith across the wintry sea,
Here in the wilderness to raise thine altars,
In simple truth to serve and worship Thee.
Hear us, their children, at thine altar kneeling,
Almighty God, stretch forth Thy powerful hand;
O, like our fathers, still to Thee appealing,
Grant us true freedom! Protect our native land!

When, in past days, uprose our sires heroic,
Whose spirit brave no tyrant could appal,
'Twas in Thy name they fought to found the nation
On freedom, justice, equal rights for all.
Hear us, their children, at thine altar kneeling,
Almighty God, stretch forth Thy powerful hand;
O, like our fathers, still to Thee appealing,
Save the Republic! Protect our native land!

Lo, once again Thy spirit roused the nation,
To rise in might th' imperilled land to save;
Marshalled in arms the patriot hosts of freedom,
And struck the shackles from the cow'ring slave.
Hear us, their children, at thine altar kneeling,
Almighty God, stretch forth Thy powerful hand;
O, like our fathers, still to Thee appealing,
God save the Union! Protect our native land!

Still, still, around us giant ills are threatening,
And slaves to passion, ignorance, and fear
Ask our redemption, while, the battle waging,
We fight for virtue, home, and country dear.
Hear us, we pray, before Thine altar kneeling,
Almighty God, stretch forth Thy powerful hand;
O, like our fathers, still to Thee appealing,
Help us to conquer! Redeem our native land!

Mr. Wendté is to preach in Little Portland-street Chapel on Whit Sunday morning, and at Higate in the evening. Dr. Crothers will preach at Little Portland-street on the following Sunday morning, June 2, at Wandsworth in the evening, and in Manchester College Chapel, Oxford, on June 9.

Mr. Wendté and Dr. Crothers were to sail last Saturday by the Leyland s.s. Castrian, due in Liverpool on the 20th inst. After the Whit-week Meetings Mr. Wendté is to visit the Continent in the interest of the International Council.

BERMONDSEY.

SIR,—May I call the attention of your readers to an advertisement which appears in your columns foreshadowing the immediate closing of this chapel?

The trustees, on whose behalf the notice is given, are entitled to sympathy in regard to the awkward position in which they are placed by circumstances. The congregation, after a long struggle with adversity, is no longer organised; though the services, attended by a few faithful people, have hitherto been regularly continued. No funds are raised on the spot, except the modest weekly offering; and the London District Unitarian Society, after a good deal of experience, has decided that, as a self-supporting church apparently cannot be raised in this neighbourhood, it would be improper to expend its slender resources here any longer. This decision, which carries with it the withdrawal of a grant from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, leaves the work at Bermondsey wholly unsupported, except so far as it derives personal aid at this juncture from the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, the minister-at-large of the South-Eastern Province. There is no endowment, and the trustees are left without means to meet the expenses of keeping the church open. Hence their notice of motion.

Now Mr. Edwards reports that, notwithstanding the meagre attendances at the services, there is much good work being done in Bermondsey in connection, namely, with the following institutions:—(1) The Sunday-school, attended by over 100 scholars; (2) the Band of Hope, also well-attended; and (3) the Boys' Club, with an average attendance of fifty youths of between the ages of thirteen and twenty-one. No one who knows the London streets will fail to see the significance of these statements, especially that respecting the Boys' Club. All three agencies are ably officered by earnest volunteers who are willing, and indeed most desirous, to continue their work amongst these young people.

Is it to be endured that such work should be allowed to cease for want of the funds required for working expenses? If there were ready to hand any practicable scheme for utilising the proceeds of a sale in any other part of London, we might accept the extinction of these institutions as a painful necessity; but, so far as I know, no such scheme exists. The difficulties of employing to the full the valuable premises in Fort-road are no doubt very great; and yet it must be wiser to use them for a small, if for a really beneficial, result, rather than not at all.

I feel sure that the churches on the roll of the Provincial Assembly will not only deplore the loss of one of their number, should this resolution to close be carried into effect, but they will throw some part of the responsibility on their own executive, and will severely criticise them if by any neglect or supineness they allow all this good work among the young people of Bermondsey to lapse. Nor will these feelings be confined to our local friends, for all who have had experience know how hard it is to create such work anew, and how necessary it is to preserve every agency for good.

I have good hope, therefore, that—at least temporarily—the trustees will stay their hand, and that Mr. Edwards will be allowed to make arrangements for continuing and, if possible, increasing our religious activities at this centre. Surely there are those among us who will assist him personally, and as surely the congregations at large will gladly supply the additional income required by the Assembly's treasurer to meet the increased liability, which need not (I estimate) be much more than £50 during the next twelvemonth. At the end of that period, or before, a more permanent settlement might be devised. But, at present, let there be no closing, please.

SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

BREAKFAST AND ANNUAL MEETING.

SIR,—I shall be obliged by your granting me space to appeal to ministers and delegates who have received complimentary tickets for the breakfast, and who are unable to make use of them, to return the same to the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie at Essex Hall without delay. By doing so they will make it easier to provide properly for the guests and others who wish to be at the breakfast.

LONDON SUNDAY-SCHOOL SOCIETY.

SIR,—May I be allowed to call the attention of your readers to the services to be held on Whit-Sunday, under the direction of the London Sunday-school Society. A scholars' service will take place at Essex Hall at 3.30, to be conducted by the Rev. Page Hopps. To this are invited the scholars over fourteen years of age attending our Sunday-schools, accompanied by their teachers. The Society will be glad to see our country visitors at the service.

In the evening at seven a teachers' and Church-workers' service will be held at Little Portland-street Chapel, when the Rev. J. N. Blatchford will officiate. We shall be glad to see a full muster, and as many of our country visitors as can attend.

Will our London ministers and Sunday-school superintendents kindly make themselves known?

Tea will be provided at Essex Hall for those desirous of attending both services.

HOWARD YOUNG,
President London Sunday-school.

THE WHIT-WEEK MEETINGS.

DELEGATES AND MINISTERS.

SIR,—May I be allowed to say that the delegates of congregations and Sunday-schools, whose names and addresses were returned on the form sent to the secretaries, have now had their complimentary tickets and invitations forwarded to them by post. Ministers who returned their special forms before April 30 have been provided with hospitality at private houses or at hotels, and tickets and invitations have also been forwarded to them. Several secretaries of congregations and some ministers have not returned the forms, and in these cases no tickets or invitations have been sent out. Every care has been taken in the office to avoid mistakes, but if any have happened, I shall be glad to be informed at once.

ANOTHER WHITSUNTIDE MEETING.

PROTEST AGAINST AGGRESSION AN MILITARISM IN SOUTH AFRICA.

SIR,—May we be allowed to draw the attention of your readers to a meeting which is to be held in London in Whit-week to give opportunity to Unitarians and other Liberal Christians to express their disapproval of the aggressive and military action of the present Government, more particularly as regards South Africa.

It is hoped that this meeting will afford an opportunity of welcoming Mr. Saur (if he has returned to London) and of expressing sympathy with him and with his Dutch fellow-patriots.

The meeting at Clifford's-inn convened last Whitsuntide to protest against the suppression of free speech in England, and the annexation of the two South African Republics, evoked such warm expressions of sympathy and approval that it makes us feel it to be a duty, not to enter on the new century, without giving our co-religionists an opportunity of expressing their opinion on these grave, national, and international questions.

Full particulars will be advertised in the papers next week.

AN EXPLANATION.

SIR,—Mr. Armstrong's fairness and generosity to opponents are so well known that, on reading his comments in your current issue, I am forced to the hypothesis that a misunderstanding has occurred somewhere.

I declined to reply to a certain recent letter, because it appeared to me to contain a personal attack, impugning my veracity and honesty, and because I deemed such a temper as the letter in question seemed to display specially unprofitable for the discussion of spiritual things.

After carefully re-reading the letter, I am reluctantly compelled to adhere to my interpretation of it; but it is evident that Mr. Armstrong views it in a different light, as he is the last one to approve of personalities as controversial weapons.

J. WARSCHAUER.

[This personal matter must now be left to the judgment of our readers.—ED. INQ.]

THE annual meeting of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association was held at Stockton on Monday. Representatives from Newcastle, Gateshead, Sunderland, Shields, Carlisle, Middlesboro', Darlington and Thornaby were present, and Mr. Cox Walker, of Darlington, presided over an unusually large meeting. A paper was read by Mr. W. J. Watson, of Thornaby, on "The Essentials of a Practical and Popular Scheme of Reorganisation for the Northern Unitarian Association." An animated discussion followed, in which Alderman Baxter Ellis, J.P., of Newcastle, the Rev. C. Roper, of Manchester, and others took part. What the tenor of the paper was, and of the subsequent discussion, we have not heard. After tea a public meeting was held, Alderman Baxter Ellis, J.P., in the chair, when addresses were given by the Revs. C. Roper, A. Harvie, C. Travers and F. Wood. On the previous Sunday the Rev. C. Roper had preached in connection with the 213th anniversary of the Stockton congregation. The Northern Echo reports that the Unitarians of the district propose to make a pilgrimage on Saturday, June 22, to Catterick, in Yorkshire, of which Theophilus Lindsey was vicar, when in 1773, as a Unitarian confessor, he resigned his living in the Church, and founded the Essex Chapel in London, which is now Essex Hall.

COUNTRY HOLIDAY MOVEMENT.—Miss A. Lawrence, 23, Campden House-chambers, Campden-hill, London, W., begs to acknowledge, with many thanks, receipt for this fund of the following sums:—Mr. John Harrison, £2 2s.; Mr. and Mrs. Bromley, £1 1s.; Mrs. Holt, £2; Mrs. Collier, £1 1s.; Mr. P. M. Martineau, £1 1s.; Mrs. Robinson, £5 5s.; Mr. Pallister Young, 10s. 6d.; Mrs. Aspland, £1 1s.; Mrs. Temple, £1 1s.; Mrs. A. Lawrence, £2 2s.

OUR "DOUBLE" IN SCOTLAND.

THOUGH Emerson stated the fact of heredity so strongly as to make it almost fatalistic, he was obliged to declare that "men resemble their contemporaries even more than their progenitors." The reason assigned by him for the resemblance is that the "ideas of the time are in the air and infect all who breathe it." A remarkable illustration of Emerson's declaration was given (undesigned) in the address of the chairman of the Scottish Congregational Union (Mr. John Leith, of Aberdeen) at the recent annual meeting at Glasgow. His address disclosed a striking resemblance between Unitarians and Congregationalists. He declared that all his life he had been "devoid of reverence for that which is old and effete or cumbrous and slow." He affirmed his belief in breadth and, in the truest sense, in a "liberal theology." Speaking for the Congregational Union, he said: "There is room for all varieties of opinion and belief that do not conflict with the eternal verities—the central truths of our Christian faith. We impose no creed; we demand no conformity to standards; we demand no uniformity of Christian experience; we impose no particular methods of Christian action; we leave to each the liberty of thought and service with which Christ makes his people free."

These expressions are so like those usually uttered at our annual meetings that, on reading them as spoken at a Congregational Assembly, we wonder why Unitarian and Congregational Churches in Scotland are so severely separate.

The words uttered by Mr. Leith fit the position of our churches accurately. Our list and interpretation of the "eternal verities" may not be precisely the same as theirs, but what of that? Variety is not excluded, but is authorised by liberty.

Recently, the Editor of the Scottish Congregational Magazine published a discourse on the "Genius of Congregationalism," in which he emphasised its freedom from dogmatic bonds. It practically permits of utterances by such preachers as Dr. Anderson, of Dundee, and Dr. Hunter, of Glasgow, that are not in any respect different from those of our most advanced men. Would the Scottish Congregational Union admit us? We have carried liberty of thought further up and in than some Congregationalists, but we have not broken with any of the "eternal verities." Why should that advance be deemed a bar to fraternity?

But, after all, the resemblance may be superficial only. Does Congregationalism stand for some conception of God or of Christ which it virtually holds as a dogma? If so, does it not violate its own principle? Are the hands those of Esau, while the voice is Jacob's?

The traditions of Scottish Congregationalism are Calvinistic, but its actual faith is not that of Calvin.

It recently absorbed an Arminian body, and the preachers named are certainly nearer to Martineau than to Wardlaw: should it absorb the Scottish Unitarians next? An overture to the Union is not suggested on our part, but it is worth our while to take note of a resemblance which points a moral. ALEX. WEBSTER.

WELSH MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

THE annual festival of the Glamorgan Unitarian Musical Association was held on Monday last at the "Gnol"—English Congregational Chapel, Neath—kindly lent for the occasion. No more central meeting-place, or more suitable for the contingents from our various churches, was possible—spacious enough for comfort, restful to the feelings, and acoustically perfect for musical purposes. The chair was occupied in the afternoon by Councillor Hopkin Morgan, a deacon of the church, whose easy flow of English and Welsh helped to make him a most efficient chairman, while his introductory address on the value of these festivals, which he described as a source of innocent enjoyment, of personal spiritual help and of strength to our public worship, was much appreciated. It was estimated that the number of singers present could not have been much under 350, while the audience counted nearly as many. The singers nearly filled the galleries, and the audience occupied the floor. The leader (or precentor) this year was the Rev. David Evans, Cwmbach, and the organist Mr. Morgan Morgan, of Aberdare.

The leader explained that the singers had not practised together before, and that the afternoon performance must be considered simply as a kind of rehearsal; but he promised that the evening performance would be better, and so it was. That of the afternoon was full of promise, while that of the evening was grand, much of it overwhelming in its power, sweeping over the audience and compelling the sensitive Celtic portion of it to join in. The evening service was presided over by our young friend, Mr. Louis Cobden Thomas, solicitor, this year Mayor of Neath, who comes of a good old Unitarian stock, and is still faithful to the old flag. Most of the local ministers were present and took part; Messrs. Phillips (of Nottage) and Jenkins (of Gellionen) respectively led in prayer. During the various intervals—necessary as breathing space to those taking part—several speeches were given, the most noteworthy, perhaps, being that of the Rev. Tudor Jones (of Swansea) and of Miss Rowlands (of Froodvale, Neath), both bearing on singing and its relation to public worship. Miss Rowlands, who can boast of a Nonconformist ancestry extending over 200 years, being descended from Matthew Henry, by her ready sympathy and help contributed materially to make these meetings a success.

During the usual formalities at the close, the minister of the church, responding on behalf of himself and the Baptist brethren who had lent their spacious hall for the afternoon tea, said they were delighted to have the opportunity to help the Unitarians, who had always been faithful to liberty of thought, and had always clung to their faith, however unpopular it might sometimes be.

The day was delightfully fine, and all things worked together towards a successful issue. May the great labour expended be blessed to the strengthening of our churches and the spiritual edification of all who engaged therein!

WE need only obey. There is a guidance for each of us, and by lowly listening we shall hear the right word.—Emerson.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

APPEAL.

London: Stratford, E.—The teachers of the Sunday-school make their customary appeal for help towards the expense of the scholars' annual summer excursion. Contributions will be thankfully received by Mr. W. J. Noel (treasurer), Briarwood, Grove-hill, S. Woodford, Essex, or Mr. George Shute (secretary), 53A, Romford-road, Stratford, Essex.

Dewsbury.—On Sunday evening last the Rev. J. Morgan Whiteman preached in Unity Church a special sermon on "The New Old Book," the occasion being the installation of a new pulpit Bible (Revised Version).

Framlingham.—The many friends of this ancient congregation will be glad to hear that progress is being made with the restoration of the old Manse. Mr. Frank Brown, of Ipswich, the architect, in a recent report to the trustees, tells of an interesting piece of old work above the entrance door which has been discovered, and which he is anxious to preserve in situ. The entrance door proves to have been reduced in height, a moulded oak-head having been inserted 220 years ago. An inscription is visible, consisting of the date 1681, and the letters G. over R. B. The original oak moulded frame of the doorway still remains, and it is interesting to speculate how much older it is than the year named, very possibly stretching back two centuries more. It will be interesting for some one acquainted with the ancient history of the Manse to identify the occasion of the alteration. There is reason to know that the Manse was for some time an inn.

Halifax.—The Sunday-school anniversary services were held at Northgate-end Chapel on Sunday last, when the Rev. C. H. Wellbeloved, of Southport, preached eminently suitable and helpful sermons morning and evening; the morning sermon contained a very interesting reference to the beginning of Sunday-schools in the North of England and at York. The Song Service, "The Story of Theodore Parker," was given in the afternoon, Mr. S. G. Foster being the reader. The music at all the services was under the direction of Mr. A. Wilson, and scholars, choir, and organist filled their parts well. The collections for the Sunday-school were over £25. In connection with the anniversary, a lecture is to be given on the 20th inst. by the Rev. Edgar I. Fripp on "The Historical and Literary Value of the Book Genesis."

Halstead.—The annual flower service was conducted on Sunday, 12th inst., by Mr. C. F. Dear, of Southend, who discoursed on "The Lesson of Flowers." A large congregation filled the chapel, which was tastefully decorated with flowers. The well-known string band, under the leadership of Mr. Finch, rendered several selections during the evening, which added to the charm of the service. The congregation mourns the loss of Mrs. Mallett, one of its members, who has just passed away at a ripe old age; the funeral service was conducted on Wednesday last by Mr. Dear.

London: Forest Gate.—An entertainment, consisting of a Floral Play—adapted from one of Mrs. Gatty's "Parables from Nature"—musical drill, and selections, vocal and instrumental, all rendered by the Upton-lane Sunday scholars and teachers, has just been most successfully given. The Misses Wilson, Miss Tolmie, and Miss Unett share the credit of this happy effort.

London: Limehouse.—On Thursday, May 9, the teachers, workers, and friends of the Durning Hall Mission gave the minister and his wife a very pleasant surprise. An evening concert had been arranged for that date, and in the interval Councillor G. T. Smith, who occupied the chair, said he had been entrusted with a very pleasant duty, and he also believed he had a secret to divulge, for the teachers and friends wished to mark the twenty-fifth year of Mr. and Mrs. Toye's wedded life with a token of their esteem and good wishes, by presenting them with two electro-plated baskets and a biscuit jar. He was pleased to be present for more reasons than one, in the first place to add to the testimony of good feeling that existed between Mr. and Mrs. Toye and their band of workers, and in the second place to wish his manager, Mr. Axe, many happy returns of the day. He was glad that this event happened on the same day, because he knew how much interest Mr. Axe had always taken in Durning Hall during the years he had been one of the Sunday-school teachers, and thought that it added greatly to the confidence that existed between master and man. It made each feel that the other was doing his part as a citizen, for the betterment of the locality in which they resided. Mr. Toye, responding, said among other things that the twenty-five years of a peaceful happy married life had been much intensified by twenty-five years connection with religious work in East London, and he was pleased to see so many friends present, some of whom had been connected with the work from childhood. The intrinsic worth of the presentation was much enhanced by the kindly thought and feeling expressed by one and all. The proceedings closed with a hearty vote of thanks to the chairman, proposed by Mr. Segust and seconded by Mr. Axe.

London: Stepney.—The annual meeting of the congregation was held on May 9 Dr. Herbert Smith presided. Although the Finance Committee was not able to bring over a large credit balance, the report was considered very satisfactory. Deep appreciation was expressed of the faithful work of the Rev. Lucking Tavener, and then the members gave a hearty welcome to Mr. P. W. Ames, who had undertaken the work. Mr. Ames has had a large experience in organising and teaching, and he comes to Stepney full of enthusiasm and vigour to do his best in promoting the cause of free religion at College Chapel. Votes of thanks to Miss Florence Hill and Dr. Herbert Smith concluded the meeting.

Macclesfield.—The congregation of King Edward-street Chapel met on Wednesday evening the 8th inst, to bid farewell to their minister, the Rev. A. Leslie Smith. After speeches from the Rev. Joseph Freeston, Major Coppock, the Rev. Adam Rushton, Mrs. Russell, and Mr. W. H. Mason (secretary), a handsome clock and two vases were presented to Mr. Smith on behalf of the congregation as a mark of their esteem and good wishes. He acknowledged their useful and artistic present, and their kind words in appreciation of his work.

Maidstone.—The annual meeting of the Earl-street congregation took place in the Mechanics' Room on Wednesday evening, May 8. After tea the chair was taken by Major W. Haynes, J.P., who, with a few appropriate remarks, called on Mr. F. W. Ruck (the hon. secretary) to read the annual statement of accounts. This showed that the chapel, both financially and numerically, was in a better position than in the previous year. He said that the committee and congregation were very much indebted to the ladies who formed the Sewing Circle (of which Mrs. M. A. Ruck is president), which had been a great financial help, and especially to Miss Ellis and Miss White (hon. treasurer and hon. secretary respectively), who had worked hard to bring about so good a result. The Sunday-school report was very satisfactory, and Miss Ellis (superintendent) and the staff of teachers were deserving of the highest praise for their efforts in this direction, while the Rev. S. S. Brettell, M.A., had taken an active part in assisting the teachers. The Chapel Committees having been appointed, Mr. F. W. Ruck was re-elected hon. secretary and Mr. E. Weeks collector, and both were thanked for their services. The Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A., President of the Provincial Assembly, gave an eloquent address, and the meeting was also addressed by Mr. Haynes, Mr. A. J. Ellis, and the Rev. S. S. Brettell. During the evening a programme of music and recitations was carried out.

Malton (Appointment).—The Rev. W. Rodger Smyth has accepted an invitation to the Wheelgate Chapel pulpit, and begins his new duties in June.

Mottram.—On Sunday last the Rev. J. A. Pearson, of Oldham, preached Sunday-school anniversary sermons. Fine weather brought many welcome visitors from neighbouring congregations, and the services and sermons were much appreciated. The collections amounted to a little over £22.

Poole.—On Sunday, May 5, at the afternoon discussion-class an address on "Liberal Religious Life in Russia" was given by Mr. V. Tchertkoff, a friend and co-worker with Count Tolstoy. Mr. Tchertkoff gave a most interesting account of modern religious movements in Russia, and especially that with which Count Tolstoy is identified. The action of the State Church in countenancing the many persecutions of all forms of dissent was severely condemned. A discussion followed, and a hearty vote of thanks from the large congregation, which included representatives from nearly all the churches in the town, brought a very enjoyable evening to a close.

South Cheshire and District Association and Sunday School Union.—The eleventh annual meeting of this Union took place at Shrewsbury on Wednesday, May 8, when representatives were present from Nantwich, Crewe, Knutsford, Chester, and Newcastle-under-Lyne. A committee meeting was held at 2.30, and was followed by the annual business meeting and conference. The report, showing an increase in average attendance over the previous year, and balance-sheet, which was also considered most satisfactory, were adopted, and the officers were elected for the ensuing year, with Mr. R. Mansell as President (for a second year of office), Mr. A. Orrett (treasurer), and the Rev. H. Haycock (secretary). A hearty welcome was given to the Rev. T. P. Spedding, representing the Manchester District Sunday School Association, and to the Rev. E. W. Lummis, M.A., and both gentlemen responded. After tea a service was conducted in the chapel, when the Rev. E. W. Lummis preached to a fairly large congregation.

THERE will come another era when it shall be light, and man will awaken from his lofty dreams and find—his dreams still there, and nothing is gone but his sleep.—J. P. Richter.

THE OPEN BROTHERHOOD.

The Concluding Sentences of Dr. EDWIN HATCH'S LECTURES on the Influence of Greek Ideas and Usages upon the Christian Church.—(Hibbert Trust, Williams and Norgate, London, 1890.)

I HAVE now brought these Lectures to a close. The net result is the introduction into Christianity of the three chief products of the Greek mind—Rhetoric, Logic, and Metaphysics. I venture to claim to have shown that a large part of what are sometimes called Christian doctrines, and many usages which have prevailed and continue to prevail in the Christian Church, are in reality Greek theories and Greek usages changed in form and colour by the influence of primitive Christianity, but in their essence Greek still. Greece lives; not only its dying life in the lecture-rooms of Universities, but also with a more vigorous growth in the Christian Churches. It lives there, not by virtue of the survival within them of this or that fragment of ancient teaching and this or that fragment of an ancient usage, but by the continuance in them of great modes and phases of thought, of great drifts and tendencies, of large assumptions. Its ethics of right and duty, rather than of love and self-sacrifice; its theology, whose God is more metaphysical than spiritual—whose essence it is important to define; its creation of a class of men whose main duty in life is that of moral exhortation, and whose utterances are not the spontaneous outflow of a prophet's soul, but the artistic periods of a rhetorician; its religious ceremonial, with the darkness and the light, the initiation and the solemn enactment of a symbolic drama; its conception of intellectual assent rather than of moral earnestness as the basis of religious society—in all these, and the ideas that underlie them, Greece lives.

It is an argument for the divine life of Christianity that it has been able to assimilate so much that was at first alien to it. It is an argument for the truth of much of that which has been assimilated, that it has been strong enough to oust many of the earlier elements. But the question which forces itself upon our attention as the phenomena pass before us in review, is the question of the relation of these Greek elements in Christianity to the nature of Christianity itself. The question is vital. Its importance can hardly be over-estimated. It claims a foremost place in the consideration of earnest men. The theories which rise out of it are two in number. It is possible to urge, on the one hand, that Christianity which began without them—which grew on a soil whereon metaphysics never throve—which won its first victories over the world by the simple moral force of the Sermon on the Mount, and by the sublime influence of the life and death of Jesus Christ, may throw off Hellenism and be none the loser, but rather stand out again before the world in the uncoloured majesty of the Gospels. It is possible to urge that what was absent from the early form cannot be essential, and that the Sermon on the Mount is not an outlying part of the Gospel, but its sum. It is possible to urge, on the other hand, that the tree of life, which was planted by the hand of God Himself in the soil of human society, was intended from the first to grow by assimilating to itself whatever elements it found there. It is possible to maintain that Christianity was intended to be a development, and that its successive growths are for the time at which they exist integral and essential. It is possible to hold that it is the duty of each succeeding age at once to accept the developments of the past, and to do its part in bringing on the developments of the future.

Between these two main views it does not seem possible to find a logical basis for a third. The one or the other must be accepted, with the consequences which it involves. But whether we accept the one or the other, it seems clear that much of the Greek element may be abandoned. On the former hypothesis, it is not essential; on the latter, it is an incomplete development and has no claim to permanence. I believe the consideration of this question, and practical action on the determination of it, to be the work that lies before the theologians of our generation. I claim for the subject which we have been considering an exceptional importance, because it will enable us, if on the one hand we accept the theory that the primitive should be permanent, to disentangle the primitive from the later elements, and to trace the assumptions on which these later elements are based; and if on the other hand we adopt the theory of development, it will enable us, by tracing the lines of development, to weld the new thoughts of our time with the old by that historical continuity which in human societies is the condition of permanence. I am not unaware that there are many who deprecate the analysis of Christian history, and are content to accept the deposit. There has been a similar timidity in regard to the Bible. It seemed a generation ago as though the whole fabric of belief depended on the acceptance of the belief that Genesis is the work of a single author. The timidity has virtually ceased. The recognition of the fact that the Book of Genesis was not made, but grew, so far from having been a danger to religion, has become a new support of the faith. So it will be with the analysis of Christian doctrine and of Christian history; and therefore I am earnest in urging its study. For though the Lectures are ended, the study of the subject has only begun. I have ventured as a pioneer into comparatively unexplored ground: I feel that I shall no doubt be found to have made the mistakes of a pioneer; but I feel also the certainty of a pioneer—who after wandering by devious paths through the forest and the morass, looks out from the height which he has reached upon the fair landscape—and speaking as one who has so stood and so looked, I am sure that you will find the country to be in the main what I have described it to be, and that you will find also that it is but the entrance to a still fairer landscape beyond. FOR THOUGH YOU MAY BELIEVE THAT I AM BUT A DREAMER OF DREAMS, I SEEM TO SEE, THOUGH IT BE ON THE FAR HORIZON—THE HORIZON BEYOND THE FIELDS WHICH EITHER WE OR OUR CHILDREN WILL TREAD—A CHRISTIANITY WHICH IS NOT NEW BUT OLD, WHICH IS NOT OLD BUT NEW, A CHRISTIANITY IN WHICH THE MORAL AND SPIRITUAL ELEMENTS WILL AGAIN HOLD THEIR PLACE, IN WHICH MEN WILL BE BOUND TOGETHER BY THE BOND OF MUTUAL SERVICE, WHICH IS THE BOND OF THE SONS OF GOD, A CHRISTIANITY WHICH WILL ACTUALLY REALIZE THE BROTHERHOOD OF MEN, THE IDEAL OF ITS FIRST COMMUNITIES.

EXPERIMENTS ON MONKEYS.

A recent writer on this subject says:—"That the most infamous atrocities are practised at the present moment, upon these, the nearest to us in structure and intelligence of all our 'lesser brethren,' the Medical Journals show. The number of the Journal of Pathology for December, 1900, contains accounts of protracted torture of these sensitive beings which make the blood boil and the heart sicken. The article is named 'Further Observations and Experiments on the Thyroid and Parathyroid'; and the writer speaks as coolly of cutting out nerves from the living flesh and of removing portions of a frame as ready to quiver with anguish as his own, as if he talked of scooping out the core of an apple or depriving an orange of its pips. No mention is made of anæsthetics throughout this fearful paper, nor could any such things have alleviated the sufferings of the monkeys during the days, weeks, and months of their slow martyrdom."

ANNIVERSARY HYMN.

O LIFE that makest all things new,
The blooming earth, the thoughts of men,
Our pilgrim feet, wet with thy dew,
In gladness hither turn again.

From hand to hand the greeting flows,
From eye to eye the signals run,
From heart to heart the bright hope glows,
The lovers of the Light are one.

One in the freedom of the Truth,
One in the joy of paths untrod,
One in the soul's perennial youth,
One in the larger thought of God,—

The freer step, the fuller breath,
The wide horizon's grander view,
The sense of life that knows no death,—
The Life that maketh all things new!

SAMUEL LONGFELLOW.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WELCOME to our guests from far and near, for a week of crowded interests and happy fellowship! What we are to do as humble chronicler of this week, who will say? What? Report, report—all those meetings, that turmoil of excursions and sociabilities, that thronging of friends new and old? And if we attempted it, and offered at once a full report of all that will be said and all that happens, where would the paper come from to hold it all, and who would read it—and who would pay for it? No. We shall not attempt the impossible, and waste our own and our readers' strength and patience by a vain and unprofitable undertaking.

WHAT will happen, so far as next week's INQUIRER is concerned, Friday morning will show. Unless all hopes are vain, we shall then be able at least to offer to our readers Mr. Stopford Brooke's sermon and Mr. Carpenter's address as President of the International Council, and some account of the progress of the week up to Thursday afternoon. What else there may be we will not forecast, knowing the ugly fate that often lies in wait to trip a hapless editor at the last moment to a disastrous fall. But that should be enough for one week, and our purpose is that other important utterances shall be reported as fully as possible during the following weeks.

As to the International Council, it will be seen that there are more papers promised than can possibly be read in the time available; but unless again that same fate should unexpectedly intervene, we shall publish one or two of these papers regularly, from week to week, until the whole series is placed in the hands of our readers. There is one disappointment which we know already that we must bear in connection with the International Council. One of the guests whom we should have most delighted to honour, Professor Pfleiderer, of Berlin, cannot come. Much to his own disappointment, and to our great loss, he is kept by pressing University and other duties at home, and his paper on "The Social Activities of the Age and their Religious Significance" will be read by the President. The writers of other papers we have known from the first could not be here, but if we have our way we shall in time print them all!

IN this week's Provincial Letter Mr. Tarrant tells of the prospect of the meetings, and we would add here one or two more warnings and beseechings. Whoever has any tickets for the service in St. James's Hall, or for any other of the meetings, and does not mean to use them, please return them at once to Essex Hall; and if there is anyone who has still any questions to ask, let him write by return of post or else refrain from asking. Some hundreds of letters of inquiry have come in, greatly adding to the burden of work laid on the secretary and his staff, which might have been answered by a more careful reading of the full programme. Letters which arrive at Essex Hall later than the first post on Monday, might well, we should say, be left unopened until the end of the week.

As to the meetings, we understand that almost every available ticket for the Sunday-school breakfast has long since been taken up, and no one will have a chance of paying double price for one. It has been necessary to refuse hundreds of applications for invitations to the Mansion House Reception, and large numbers for the most popular of the excursions. For the public meeting in the Westminster Town Hall it has been necessary to engage the Council Chamber (which holds about 500) for an overflow meeting, so that altogether the promise is of a thoroughly good time. But let no one ask an unnecessary question, and let everyone bear any inevitable disappointments as all good people do!

THE Chairman of the General Arrangements Committee desires us to say that it will add to the interest and enjoyment of visitors attending the Whit-week meetings if those staying at the same hotels or boarding-houses will make themselves known to each other. It is particularly requested that delegates should introduce themselves to the Chairman or some member of the Committee at the afternoon teas, the conversazione, and the receptions. It is hoped that all will contribute towards making the meetings memorable for their sociability.

ON Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday, each morning will begin with a brief devotional service in Essex Hall at 9.30. After that time until the service is concluded no one will be permitted to enter the Hall or to approach the doors on the upper floor, so that the service may not be disturbed by talking outside. Friends will therefore be wise to take their places in good time.

VISITORS to Essex Hall next week will find in the book-room a large number of books, new and old, English and American, to many of which we should have been glad to call their special attention; but in the throng of other interests we have not found it possible. We hope, however, that many of our friends will pick up the May number of the Mill Hill Pulpit, which contains Mr. Hargrove's "Sermon of May Flowers," and also the new number of Present Day Papers, which contains an article by Dr. Rendel Harris on "The Elements of a Progressive Church," and the fourth of Mr. Henry Binns's "Studies of the Social Ideal," which treats of "The Chinese Peasant," and contains lessons we shall all do well to take to heart.

IN addition to the names of the foreign delegates which appear in our time-table, representatives from the following countries will be present, and several of them will take part in the proceedings:—America—the Rev. W. H. Fish (Colorado Springs), Mr. John Fretwell (Providence), the Rev. L. G. and Mrs. Wilson (Hopedale); Australia—Mr. J. M. Alexander (Melbourne), Mr. W. Simpson (Adelaide); Cape Town — Mr. W. S. Woodhead; France—Madame Fontanes, Madame and and Mdlle. Reville (Paris); Germany—Dr. C. Lempfuhl (Berlin); Holland—the Rev. P. H. Hugenholtz (Amsterdam); Iceland—Dr. Jan Stephansson; India—Dr. J. C. and Mrs. Bose (Calcutta), Mr. and Mrs. Ghosh; Italy—Signor Bracciforti (Milan); Jutland—Mrs. Sass.

MISS HONOR BROOKE gave a recital of Macbeth on May 18 at the Spa Hall, Clifton, in aid of the Lewin's Mead Domestic Mission. There was a large and most appreciative audience, which followed Miss Brooke's masterly rendering of Shakespeare's great tragedy with every sign of deep and sustained interest. Not only did the gifted reciter prove herself fully equal to the great physical strain involved in such a reading, showing no sign of fatigue as the evening wore on, but she succeeded in a remarkable degree both in individualising the widely varying characters of the play and in bringing out the marvellous poetic beauty of the lines. Where all was on such a high level of excellence, the sleep-walking scene must yet be specially mentioned as affording the finest illustration of Miss Brooke's dramatic power and skill in the use of voice and gesture alike. Next to Miss Brooke herself, the thanks of all who are interested in the Mission are due to the Misses Worsley, who had made and supervised the arrangements for the recital, from first to last.

THE Auckland Star of March 29, which has just reached us, reports the annual meeting of the Auckland Unitarian Church, which was held in the Cook-street Hall on the previous Wednesday evening. A satisfactory financial statement was presented, and the report showed that during the year the number of members had been doubled. A resolution of gratitude for the aid of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association was unanimously passed.

THE April number of the Australian Herald, Dr. Charles Strong's monthly, refers to a wish expressed according to the Australian Christian World by Dr. Marshall of the Scot's Church, Melbourne, that the new century might see a federation of the Protestant Churches of Australia, and goes on to ask whether Dr. Marshall is really prepared to carry out the Protestant principle of Christian Freedom to its full length, and to unite with his fellow-Protestants on a broad, spiritual, catholic basis.

Is he prepared practically to recognise that to be a religious man in the sense of Christ is not necessarily to hold the dogmas of the Westminster Confession, or to think as Presbyterians, Anglicans, Baptists, or any other sect, have thought about God, Christ, Religion? Is he prepared to practically recognise that the Catholic Church of God is far wider than the ecclesiastical systems of any of the Churches, and than any "orders," Presbyterian or Anglican? Is he prepared to change the present immoral system of subscription to a creed no longer believed, even at the risk of losing church property? We hope he is.

What is wanted to-day is a Free, Catholic Church of the Spirit. Logically, there is for Protestants no midway house. They have long enough halted between two opinions, and their insane divisions, so well-pleasing to their enemies, must cease. These divisions rest on conceptions of the Bible and of Christianity which wider experience, study of the Bible, and critical knowledge of the history of Christianity and the Church have exploded. It is only ignorance, prejudice, pride, and love of money and lands, that now stand in the way of a Free Catholic Church.

THE scandal of the Royal Buckhounds is at last at an end. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in laying before Parliament the Government's proposals for the new Civil List, stated that the buckhounds were to be abolished, an announcement which will be received with the utmost satisfaction by all friends of the tame stag and of manly sport. It has since been reported that the King is distributing the hounds, and that some of them are to go out to a new life in South Africa.

WANDERINGS.

WHERE have I been?—O happy words! the key
That straight unlocks the picture gallery
Where memory treasures countless lovely sights,
With blessed thoughts and silent pure delights.
Where have I been?—The question is a charm
That stills the present pain, the present harm,
And leads me into quiet haunts of peace
'Neath moonlit skies, by shining summer seas,
O'er heathery moorlands, and through meadows, gay
With buttercups, and fragrant with the "may."
Swift as the light I travel! free as air!
For now I gaze on Edinburgh fair;
Then, in a trice, I've crossed the seas and dwell
On Erin's farthest shores, and hear the swell
And roar of the Atlantic, and behold
Its waves flash into fairy phosphorescent gold.
Eastward I turn, and, in a magic boat,
Along the Rhine's romantic stream I float,
While from its vine-clad slopes and ruined heights
Come songs and legends old—of valiant knights,
Dragons and hapless maids! Southward I go,
Where the sweet pine-wood airs about me blow,
And in the starry summer night look down
On Heidelberg—its castle, tower, and town,
And Neckar's rushing stream. I turn the page
And see that moment in my pilgrimage
When first—at dawn, dreamlike, in rosy light,
Far, far away, a heavenly vision bright—
Before my awe-filled heart and glad eyes rose
A range of Alps, white with eternal snows.

Pleasant it is through foreign lands to range,
Yet for their treasures all I would not change
Our dear familiar spot of English ground,
Which doth embrace within its sea-girt bound
More various beauties than are elsewhere seen
In the same narrow space the wide world round I ween.
It is a classic land! The famous past
Its glamour o'er the present scene doth cast.
About these walls stories of olden time
Close as their green protecting ivies twine.
Pageants were here and royal festivals,
And, last, a day of strife, when all the halls
With cries and groans and battle din were filled.
The fighters fight no more, the noise is stilled;
And see, beneath the baron's sculptured crest
Bright birdling eyes peep from a tiny nest,
While, from the neighbouring grove, a cooing dove
Fills the soft sunshine with his notes of love.
Here martyrs entered Heaven through gates of flame;
Here freemen fought in Freedom's holy name.
Within this fane, dear to all England's race,
The sad have solace found and sinners grace,
While, through long centuries, the changing hours
Have cast their lights and shadows round its towers.
To country pleasures turn I—feel the charm
Of homely beauties—hear about the farm
The peaceful farmyard sounds—the crowing cock,
The ringing flail, the bleatings of the flock.
Young creatures sport upon the daisied lea,
Larks, lost in light, rain down their melody;
The common is ablaze with golden broom,
And primrose stars the leafy woods illume.

. . . . .

My verse would never end if I should tell
The pictures all that in my palace dwell;
The countless sacred memories of joy
That life can never lose nor death destroy.
Each spot, each season, aye, each passing hour,
Has of earth's loveliness its special dower
Wherever we may roam, the bending skies
Touch and enwrap us with their mysteries,
And fairest days are those when we no end
To the green earth behold, but see its margin blend
With rainbow hues of air: so even here
Immortal spirits breathe Heaven's atmosphere,
And walk with angels, and, on sea and land,
Discern with joy the workings of God's hand.

LITERATURE.

PHILLIPS BROOKS.*

The author of this voluminous work tell us that when Phillips Brooks came to Boston in 1869 many attempts were made, but all in vain, to classify him among the preachers, theologians, and teachers of the day. The truth is that Phillips Brooks was a universal man combining in himself most of the vital elements which in their distribution give significance to the various classes of the great. So all attempts to put a label on him proved futile, and the critical and classifying faculty for which, in its application to varieties of men, Boston is famous was effectually baulked. And we to-day after reading Mr. Allen's biography, wherein no pains are spared to tell us everything, confess that even with this great mass of information before us we are unable to characterise Phillips Brooks. To what school did he belong? What was his theology? Was he in his place in the Episcopal Church? Did not his views bear a stronger likeness to those of the Unitarians than to the views of any recognised school in his own Church? Did he believe in the Atonement, and, if so, in what sense? And further, what was the secret of his power? Did it lie in the intellect or the affections? How came he to be a preacher of the Gospel, and wherein does the development of his prophetic gift differ from the more common types of growth? To all these questions, in spite of Mr. Allen's great labours, it is difficult to avoid saying "we do not know." But in regard to most of the questions we make haste to add "it does not matter." The subject of Mr. Allen's biography is a Man and not a mouthpiece. The Eternal Life which is One in all souls gathers to a focus of peculiar intensity in a particular point of space and time; and that concentration is Phillips Brooks. To all minor characteristics we can afford to be blind. To discuss the question of Phillips Brooks's theology is like asking of what was the chisel made wherewith Phidias carved his Zeus. All views, doctrines, and distinctions of thought were but instruments, or perhaps channels, through which the amazing vitality of this man's spirit made itself felt by the world. We, being Unitarians, often feel that Phillips Brooks might have made a better selection of his tools. We could supply him out of our own workshop with steel of finer edge, and with measures of subtler exactitude. But the spiritual passion of which these things are the servants is not among the wares which schools of thought have to offer. It was a divine and original power in Phillips Brooks, and though it often sought expression in language which to us is obsolete, we quarrel not with the result.

Broadly speaking, there are two modes of writing a great man's life. We may compare his life to a river whose course we have to master from fountain-head to sea. In the first place we ascend some lofty peak, or a succession of such, and track the windings in long reaches, noting the plains which are watered and the valleys from which tributaries are drawn. In the second we take boat on the river at the highest point of navigable water, and, descending thence with the current, take soundings of every deep and shallow, draw careful outlines of the receding banks, note the vegetation which finds sustenance in the surrounding soil, and make a daily halt to explore the watershed, converse with its inhabitants, and gather the folk-lore of the countryside.

The demand in this country for a Life of Phillips Brooks would probably have been met had his biographer chosen the first of these methods. His occasional visits to our shores, his published sermons, and the reports which reached us of the impression he was making on the religious life of America had given him an acknowledged place in the roll of the prophets; but, after all, we know him only from afar, and cannot help a feeling that something less than sixteen hundred pages would have been enough for our satisfaction and perhaps also for our enlightenment. But Mr. Allen has written the Life on the second of the methods above described, and the fact that he has done so helps us to measure anew the large place which Phillips Brooks held in the affection of Americans as well as the power he exercised over their lives. Mr. Allen has traced every step in his hero's development, has described him from every point of view, has analysed him on every principle, and, not content with his own estimate, has gathered together the opinions of others as recorded in the Press, the admiring voice of the public, the loving tribute of the friend, and the pondered verdict of the expert. The result is a noble, but a colossal, monument to the memory of Phillips Brooks. If the memory of every great person is to be similarly treated, the world will in course of time become filled with mausoleums, and men will be so preoccupied in reading the lives of the great as to have no time left to live their own. It is to the credit of our American brethren that when they get a hero they make the most of him. But we confess that in this particular instance the length and the minuteness of the biography are somewhat suggestive of the irony of fate. Phillips Brooks, we are told again and again, was the most reserved of men; only in public was he able to give himself away in a free expression; in private intercourse clouds and darkness were round about him and none by searching could find him out. The thoroughness of reserve in which Phillips Brooks hid himself, has for its sequel the thoroughness of investigation by which Mr. Allen has revealed him. Great men should learn from this a lesson in the futility of reserve. They may be forgiven, at least the reserved among them may be, if henceforth "the dread of something after death" is mainly concerned with a vision of their private correspondence printed in small type. But let us not be misunderstood. In all the records of Phillips Brooks' private life, published by Mr. Allen, we cannot charge him with an indiscretion; nor can we say that he has introduced any matter irrelevant to his purpose, which is, first and last, to exhibit the essential greatness of a great man's soul. We think that less material might have served the purpose, but we do not say that any of the material is unfit. Nor have we found one of the sixteen hundred pages uninteresting or dull. Had the author perpetrated dulness, the art of skipping might save the reader from loss of time. Our complaint against Mr. Allen lies rather in this—that he has so fixed our attention by the importance of his matter, and so charmed us by his style, and so won us by the beautiful spirit which animates both style and matter, that he has chained us to his book, and all our other reading has fallen into arrear. By being attractive through sixteen hundred pages Mr. Allen has robbed other authors of their rights.

The book is obviously a labour of love, perhaps of discipleship, and as such it could have no offence even in the eyes of him whose veil of reserve is here so reverently but so thoroughly lifted off. In the love and the reverence which inspire them lie at once the weakness and the strength of Mr. Allen's labours. We may here repeat what has been said in reviewing another notable biography in these columns. To see a great man truly we need to have two "Lives" of him; one written by a friend, the other by an enemy. To that a condition must be added: the name of the friend may be St. John, but the name of the enemy must not be Judas.

In dealing with a book of such magnitude, and of such varied interest, the reviewer may be forgiven if he finds the task of selection impossible. We will, therefore, meet Mr. Allen on the ground of what, as was said above, we understand to be the controlling purpose of his book—namely, the presentation of Phillips Brooks as a living soul in the act of manifesting itself to the world, and will write down, as well as we can, our impression of the man as we have gathered it from these pages.

The keynote of the power of Phillips Brooks is no doubt contained in the word "personality." He was a Churchman, a scholar, a theologian; but none of these terms gives the essence of the matter. Primarily he was a preacher, and his Churchmanship, his scholarship, his theology were but the accessories of the preaching instinct, or rather the tools of the preaching function. Early in life there arose within him that mysterious impulse which urges a man to communicate himself to men, and simultaneously with this the fountains of the great deep within the soul were opened and streams of ideas and of language wherewith to clothe them poured forth in uncontrollable affluence. Out of reservoirs, fed for generations by the invisible streams of heredity, and now full, there burst forth at the early age of twenty-two the living waters of articulate thought. With a splendid precocity Phillips Brooks, scarce emerged from boyhood, was speaking a wisdom from beyond himself, understanding, as we surmise, neither the force of his own thoughts nor the origin of his own powers to express them. For aught we know, for aught Mr. Allen proves to the contrary, Phillips Brooks at this time had no theology, no reasoned convictions concerning God, the Universe, or the Soul. Reasoned convictions, born in other men's souls, or derived, it may be, from the Platonic Heaven, had, however, taken possession of his. This stage of development reached, the career of a preacher became irrevocably his career. Choice was made for him and he became unconsciously a dedicated spirit. Mr. Allen labours to make it plain to the reader why his hero chose the preacher's calling, and, we think somewhat needlessly, would have us believe that he passed through a process of conversion. That seems to us a superfluous concession to accepted phraseology; nor is it in accord with the evidence Mr. Allen himself adduces. Phillips Brooks did not choose his calling, neither did he slide into it as lesser men have done, but he was carried into it by the whirlwinds of God. Like Abram of old, Phillips Brooks went forth into the future of his profession "not knowing whither he went"—ignorant of his destination, but confident he was on the right track. It is an especially interesting case, for it inverts the psychological order of events which the preacher's entry on his calling is supposed to follow. We are too wont to imagine that a man first thinks out a theology and then, feeling the value of his conclusions, resolves to go forth and preach them to mankind. Great preachers, no doubt, have arisen in that way, but not the greatest. With Phillips Brooks the impulse to self-communication through preaching came first; it came the more strongly because of his inability to communicate himself in other ways; and it came with its own instruments already forged. And here we may observe the difference between the problem which Phillips Brooks thenceforth had to solve, and the problem with which the average preacher is confronted at the same period of his career. The average man committed to the preacher's calling must satisfy himself as to the reasonableness of his beliefs, must adjust them to what he knows of Pure Reason and her demands. With Phillips Brooks and with others like him the problem is to find not the most rational belief but the most adequate vehicle for the expression of his own personality; he finally rests, therefore, in the form of theology which gives freest scope to that impulse of self-communication which, like some resistless destiny, urges him on.

*"Life and Letters of Phillips Brooks." By Alexander V. G. Allen. 2 vols. London: Macmillan and Co. 30s. net.

The form of theology so reached is seldom the most rational, though from the nature of the case the claims of reason will not be quite forgotten; but it serves a purpose, which a purely rational theology might not serve, in providing a verbal outfit by which the life passion of that particular soul attains its easiest utterance. Of such nature we are persuaded was the theology of Phillips Brooks. It was the theology of a preacher, not of a theologian. "Why was not Phillips Brooks a Unitarian?" people were always asking. Logically, no doubt, he ought to have been one. But had Fate decreed that he should walk the world clothed in garments of the Unitarian cut we question whether there would have been the same freedom in his movement, the same largeness in his carriage, the same vigour in his stride; we doubt if it would have been so hard to say where the man ended and the clothes began. In a church named after the Holy Trinity he breathed his native atmosphere. That the fire might catch hold of his musings it was needful to wrap them in the name of Christ; and of that sacred material must he weave the bridge by which the flaming messengers had quickest transit between his soul and the souls of the thousands who hung upon his word. We confess, therefore, to feeling that in the style of his theology—we will call it Liberal Orthodoxy for want of a better name—Phillips Brooks had found the readiest means of making his life available for regenerating the lives of other men. But let each man wear his own clothes! Whosoever the preacher be that thinks to win success by the same means let him remember that the secret lay not with the theology but with the man.

In the conception which Phillips Brooks formed of the Christian ministry the aim of self-communication was paramount. And this view had its deeper source in his conception of the Christian Religion itself. "Christianity," he said, "is not a problem but a message." In the history of the Christian Church throughout the centuries he saw but one vital fact—the communication of a Life to other lives. The business of the preacher was to carry on the process, and this is what he meant by preaching Christ both as he practised it himself and as he recommended it to others. The critical reader of these memoirs will often ask in vain for some more exact definition of this idea. It is evident that to preach Christ as a fact external to himself was not the attempt of Phillips Brooks. The Christ whom he preached was indistinguishable from some element resident with himself. How far that element was some power other than his own, at what point of thought the distinction could be drawn between Phillips Brooks the preacher and the Christ whom he preached are questions which elude our analysis. Like others who follow his way of thought, he is never tired of using the name of Christ, and each time he uses it we on our part are forced to ask "What does he mean?" We are only sure of what he does not mean—and that is the human figure painted by history and known by historical evidence as it walked the fields of Palestine. At least Phillips Brooks does not mean only that. Equally certain are we that he does not mean the Christ of the Nicene Creed. What, then, can it be? We strongly suspect that the name is but a hypostasized form of the abstract idea of inspired Personality. If as a key to the preaching of this prophet we take the idea that the true Saviour of the world is Man in the highest expression of manhood much becomes intelligible that is else obscure. What the world wants is Life, and Life in ever greater abundance; and Life is given by the action of personality upon personality. This action is carried on in public by the agency of preaching; and that is the business of the Christian minister—the preacher of Christ. What other conclusion can we draw from the "Lectures on Preaching"—what other conclusion from Mr. Allen's picture of the man? Let us say that on the ground of its inner truth the conclusion carries our entire assent. But we cannot but dissent from the use thus made of the name of Christ. "The principle of Christianity is that God was in Christ." "Not a revelation by a Book but by a Being." True, but what Being? Shall we say the historical Christ of the Gospel? But of him all we know is contained in a book—or have we some intuitional knowledge of Christ by accordance with which the truth of the book is guaranteed? He is a bold man who affirms the latter position. But, failing such affirmation, how stands the matter? First, the Being guarantees the Book, and then it turns out that apart from the Book the Being is unknown. Thus the Being both guarantees and in turn is guaranteed by the Book. So long as great personalities find a vehicle of expressions in these fluid conceptions of Christ they can be made to pass current: bring them to a logical test and they vanish away.

We heartily commend the reading of these memoirs to all ministers of religion, especially to those who are of the household of faith. They will be delighted, amused, instructed and inspired. Most of their own history they will find written in the history of Phillips Brooks. We heartily thank Mr. Allen for a biography which reveals this great man in the common aspects shared by all—the labour and the battle, and in the rarer close to which all aspire—the victory and the crown of life. THE EDUCATION BILL.

THE Committee of the National Education Association, at a meeting on May 14, after considerable discussion upon the Education Bill, adopted a lengthy report for publication. The report first examines the Bill in detail, stating that by repealing the Technical Instruction Acts it abolishes all Technical Instruction Committees, and by accepting the Cockerton Judgment it ousts School Boards from an important part of the work they have hitherto performed. The large field of National Education which is thus cleared from existing methods of public control, is placed under new authorities not constituted by Parliament. These authorities will be under no statutory obligation to do anything at all. Their powers extend over a wide field, but are studiously vague and undefined, whilst existing safeguards for educational progress are abolished. The report goes on to point out that the new Education Committees have no control over any funds whatever. They administer no Government grants and only receive subsidies from the rating authorities at the pleasure of those bodies, and the rate is strictly limited in amount. There are no provisions in the Bill, such as are in previous Acts, to secure suitability of the educational provision as regards fees, staff, curriculum, and other matters; whilst the arrangements for repairing the disastrous Cockerton Judgment are most inadequate and unsatisfactory. The report ends with the following conclusions:—

CONCLUSIONS.

Parliament must Prescribe the Constitution.

That these proposals are not only inadequate, but most reactionary, may be seen by comparing them with the principles of local self-government already established by Parliament.

There is no need for the separate treatment of each locality by schemes. In regard to all the most important public local authorities (from Parish Councils upwards) Parliament has had no serious difficulty in prescribing a uniform system with sufficient elasticity in minor details to cover all variations of local conditions. There is no reason for Parliament to be compelled to debate separately different schemes for hundreds of separate localities.

Popular Control Essential.

Both the Technical Education Committees and the School Boards owe their effectiveness to the measure in which they are under the influence of the electorate which has to gain or suffer by their work. The new authorities foreshadowed in the Bill are removed as far as possible from the influence of general public opinion. A majority which may be a bare majority of gentlemen already serving on bodies popularly elected for other purposes, and not even necessarily nominated by those bodies, is not sufficient to secure that the authority to which they are nominated will either elicit popular interest or be responsive to the popular will. The new authorities in their relation to Municipal Councils resemble nothing so much as those Boards of Governors of charities and endowed schools upon which it is customary to place a few members of the municipality, but over which the municipality, and still less the electorate, has no effective control.

Adequate Funds Required.

The statutory limit upon the rate now proposed, and the need to appeal to another authority for every penny of income, must be disastrously restrictive. Apart from the question of future developments, the amount available under the Act would, in some cases, be insufficient for existing needs.

An Imperative Mandate Required.

The School Boards have been effective agents for educational progress, because they are placed under the strongest statutory compulsion to provide sufficient school accommodation and efficient and suitable instruction for every available scholar who is not otherwise provided for. There is no hint of such statutory compulsion being applied to these new authorities.

Public Schools under Public Management Essential.

Whatever there is of efficiency, suitability and adaptability in the education provided under the School Board system, is largely due to the fact that there is a statutory prohibition against the Boards spending public money upon schools which are not absolutely under their own management. The system of subsidising schools which are under private or sectarian management, which it is now proposed to revive and extend, has always proved to be most costly and ineffective, and productive of religious grievances. The Bill, at the same time, would introduce into County Councils the element of sectarian strife from which they have been, fortunately, free.

Better Provision for Elementary Education.

The Bill fails to provide any effective local authority for elementary education in those parts of the country which are still outside the School Board system. In this Bill the School Board system, providing elementary education, is the basis of the whole scheme of higher authorities. In order to make the foundation complete, the long delayed establishment of a School Board for every district in the country should be part of the Bill and should indeed precede any attempt to create new authorities for higher education.

The Bill should be Rejected.

The Bill in its whole scope and in detail offers but little hope for progress or efficiency. From beginning to end—in framing the constitution of the authority: in endowing it with an income: in the providing of schools: or increasing the efficiency of education—all the initiatory and compelling forces which make for progress in local self-government are absent or restricted, and the last word is in all cases left with whatever obstructive forces may arise. Under these circumstances we suggest that Parliament should be urged not to allow such proposals to become law.

THE MANCHESTER AND SALFORD LADIES' PUBLIC HEALTH SOCIETY.

THE society which, after some changes of title, is now known as the Ladies' Public Health Society has been in existence for many years. Its original object, to bring sanitary knowledge into the houses of the poorest, is still its primary object; but the scope of its work has of late years been greatly enlarged, owing to its being directly connected with the Sanitary Committees of the City Council of Manchester, and the Town Council of Salford, and the Medical Officers. A band of small cottage property extends almost without a break between the central business part of the town and the suburbs. This is roughly divided into districts containing each 1,000 to 2,000 cottages, and each district has a lady superintendent and a so-called health-visitor, who lives and works in the district. The health-visitor is a working woman, who knows the life of the poor from experience; she visits all the cottages in the district, makes friends with the people, gives them hints and advice on all sorts of subjects, and has her eyes open for defects of drainage, overcrowding, sickness, &c., all of which she reports on a form which is posted daily to the Medical Officer. She pays special attention to infants, and always carries about a leaflet on infant feeding, which she does not simply hand over to an ignorant young mother, who would probably throw it in the fire; instead of that she reads it for the woman, explains it to her, and, perhaps, nails it up behind the door for reference on a subsequent visit. There is no limit to the ignorance of practical things of a young woman who has spent all her unmarried life in a factory, and innumerable young mothers, who are genuinely fond and proud of their first baby, bring the poor little wretch to a speedy end by incredibly improper feeding. To many of these mothers the visits of the health-visitor are of boundless advantage, and they are grateful for her help and teaching; older women, who, perhaps, have "buried fourteen of 'em," naturally consider themselves above advice. The Medical Officer considers the work done in this matter of infant feeding of the greatest value to the community.

The health-visitor has lime brushes for lending, and is the means of getting a great deal of lime-washing done; and she is often instrumental in persuading families to exchange a small and unsanitary cottage for something better as the children grow up and need more accommodation; as a rule she can recommend a house, a caretaker, a charwoman, or whatever else may be needed to meet the wants of each case; and she can show how to make a bed, wash a baby, apply a poultice, cut out a garment, &c. The health-visitors have no special training, but the Society has been fortunate in finding women of strong character and sound practical experience, and in most cases with an almost passionate enthusiasm for their work. Their hours of work are nominally limited, but they are liable to be called on for assistance in any hour of the twenty-four, and their time and trouble are most ungrudgingly given. The lady superintendent is a sort of power behind the health-visitor; she can supply the theory on which her practice is founded; she is there to be consulted in any difficulty which arises, and she takes the whole financial responsibility. She also holds a weekly meeting in the district for purposes of "general civilisation," where by dint of constant repetition a large body of women become acquainted with the ordinary laws of health, while they in turn influence their neighbours. These meetings become a sort of meeting-place for the women of the neighbourhood, and the members habitually introduce newcomers whom they consider suitable.

The Manchester health-visitors have for nearly two years been systematically visiting and reporting on consumption cases for the Medical Officer, and the meetings are a useful opportunity of spreading a knowledge of the true nature of consumption and the means for preventing the spread of it.

The whole strength of the Society lies in the systematic endeavour to bring a knowledge of the art of decent living as now understood by the middle classes, into the homes of the poor, where, as a rule, sheer ignorance is at least as great a cause of evil, as either lack of will or lack of means, especially on the part of mothers of families; there is plenty of pure water within reach of all, but few rightly appreciate the use of it; pure air is not to be had, but in the majority of town cottages the air is far fouler than it need be; food is the largest item in the family budget, but a great deal of it is wasted by bad cooking; many children go about in rags, less from poverty than because their mother can neither make nor mend. On such items of daily life, and many more, the Ladies' Public Health Society is striving day by day to bring light into dark places.

THE CROWNING DAY.

The morning hangs its signal
Upon the mountain's crest,
While all the sleeping valleys
In silent darkness rest;
From peak to peak it flashes,
It laughs along the sky,
That the crowning day is coming by and by.

Oh, the crowning day is coming,
Is coming by and by;
We can see the rose of morning,
A glory in the sky.
And that splendour on the hill-tops,
O'er all the land shall lie,
In the crowning day that's coming by and by.

Above the generations
The lonely prophets rise—
The truth flings dawn and day-star
Within their glowing eyes;
From heart to heart it brightens,
It draweth ever nigh,
Till it crowneth all men thinking by and by.

Oh, the crowning day, &c.

The soul hath lifted moments
When life's great meaning breaketh
In sunrise on our ways;
From hour to hour it haunts us,
The vision draweth nigh,
Till it crowneth living, dying, by and by.

Oh, the crowning day, &c.

And in the sunrise standing,
Our kindling hearts confess,
That no good thing is failure,
No evil thing success.
From age to age it groweth,
That radiant Faith so high,
And its crowning day is coming by and by.

Oh, the crowning day, &c.

OBITUARY.

MISS J. DURNING SMITH.

The news of the death last Tuesday of Miss J. Durning Smith, at her residence, King's Ride, Ascot, will have brought a personal sorrow to many of our readers, and keen regret to a much wider circle, not in this country alone, to whom her deep interest in all good causes and her great benevolence have long been known.

Miss Durning Smith, who at the time of her death was fifty-seven years of age, was the elder daughter of the late Mr. Benjamin Smith, who was for many years member for Stockport, and one of those who worked with Cobden and Bright for the repeal of the Corn Laws. She was from earliest childhood an invalid, cut off from many of the pursuits of active life, but hers was the victory of a brave and cheerful spirit, keenly alive to the deeper interests of the world, eager to use every power that was given her, and blessed abundantly with the means of doing good.

If we should begin to recount her generous gifts for many years past, in support of religious and charitable work, and especially in the interest of Unitarian Christianity, to which she was ardently attached, it would be difficult to set a limit to the record. She was a great ally of the late Rev. Robert Spears in his many good works, of which the beautiful quarto edition of Channing's works was one characteristic example. She was the sole founder and supporter of the Limehouse mission at Durning Hall; and from Manchester College to the humblest country chapel it would be hard to find an institution connected with our religious community which has asked for help and has not received a prompt and kindly gift from her. By our brethren in India the news of her death will be received with sorrow, for she it was who made the first and most generous response to the appeal for the sufferers from last year's famine.

Of such a life there is little to be told, and it would wrong her memory to make any parade of the good use to which she put her abundant wealth. In her Master's spirit, with a gracious humility and abounding love, which is the greatest gift, she lived her life, bearing her own burden, and as few others, she knew the blessedness of giving. Now, assuredly, there are many who with full heart, rejoicing for her, sorrowing for others, will rise up and call her blessed.

After her parents' death Miss Durning Smith's home was with her sister and brother-in-law, Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence. The sorrow of her departure necessarily makes some alteration in the hospitable arrangements for next week, and as to this a letter from the Rev. J. Harwood will be found in another column.

The funeral is to be to-day (Saturday) at noon at Kensal Green.

JAMES HOLME NICHOLSON.

Mr. J. Holme Nicholson, M.A., formerly librarian and registrar of Owens College, died on 17th inst. at his residence, Ellerhow, Wilmslow. He was a native of Westmorland, and received his education at the Lancaster Grammar School. The following account of Mr. Nicholson's connection with Owens College and the Antiquarian Society appeared in the Manchester Guardian:—

"His long and honourable official connection with Owens College began on Nov. 15, 1853, when the college was only two years old. He was then appointed clerk and librarian. Early in 1867, on the death of Mr. J. P. Aston, who had been secretary to the Owens Trustees from the beginning, Mr. Nicholson became secretary, and in 1870 the title was changed to registrar. He resigned the librarianship in 1871, when the work in connection with the extension of the college had increased his work as chief executive officer of the college in a remarkable degree; and he relinquished his duties as registrar in the year 1884, his resignation being accepted by the Council with regret and with a deep sense of the loss which it entailed on the college and on each of its members. Mr. Nicholson was an ideal registrar, punctiliously exact in all business matters, and a courteous, kindly, and cultivated gentleman. All the students who passed through the college during the period of thirty-one years came into contact, but not into conflict, with him, and one and all will hear of his death with regret. By the governing body of the college he was held in the highest esteem. This regard was appropriately testified in 1882, when the first honorary degree of Master of Arts given by the Victoria University was bestowed on him, Dr. Ward, in presenting Mr. Nicholson to the Vice-Chancellor, said:—'Our Court has felt that the name of Mr. James Holme Nicholson—who spared no exertions for our young University in its earliest days, and who, so long as a twofold service was possible, zealously and successfully acted as its Registrar—should not be absent from the roll of its members. Nor will that name inappropriately head the list of Masters of Arts in the future registers of this University. It belongs to one, the leisure of whose vacations—when he allows himself vacations—is largely devoted to the scholarly study of antiquity; but more than this, it belongs to one in whom long and intimate experience has taught many of those who hear me to recognise qualities essential to true academic citizenship. For what is truly academic, if not a single-minded and disinterested devotion to duty—a courtesy which refines the business of life—and, in the service gladly rendered to the common cause of learning and education, a liberal willingness which scorns to measure its efforts by the rule of a nicely-calculated less or more.'

"Mr. Nicholson was a keen and discriminating archæologist, with a competent knowledge of the Roman architectural and heraldic antiquities of the country, especially of the northern counties. When the Lancashire and Cheshire Antiquarian Society was formed in 1883 he was placed on its council, and became one of its most active and valuable members. In 1898 he was elected President of the Society. Among the papers which he contributed to its transactions the following may be mentioned:—'On Winwick Cross,' 'Wilmslow Church and its Monuments,' 'The Sculptured Stones at Heysham,' 'The Ancient Presbyterian Chapel at Dean-row, Cheshire,' and 'On Pedigree Hunting.' He was also a member of the Cumberland and Westmorland Antiquarian Society, the Chetham Society (of which he was auditor), the Archæological Institute, and the Manchester Literary Club. His interest in antiquarian and literary matters was further shown by his occasional contributions to the 'Palatine Note-Book,' edited by his friend, the late Mr. J. E. Bailey, and to other journals."

Mr. Nicholson by birth and education was an Evangelical Churchman. When he came to Manchester, however, he joined the congregation at Upper Brook-street, in the last years of the ministry of the Rev. J. J. Tayler. He became a staunch Unitarian in personal conviction, but ever loved the traditions and principles of the Free Churches, more especially those of the old Protestant Dissent. He subsequently joined the congregation at Platt Chapel, and became the secretary, and during his connection with the chapel the congregation grew and prospered.

New schools were built, and a British Day School and Sunday-school formed. Platt Chapel was practically rebuilt, and a new organ erected; and so again when Mr. Nicholson on retiring from the Registrarship of Owens College went to reside at Wilmslow, he at once rendered invaluable aid to the congregation at Dean Row, and became one of the pillars of the little community and secretary. For Mr. Nicholson had the rare gift, not only of doing all to which he devoted himself with marked ability and zeal, he enabled all who were co-operating with him to do their best work also. He was the most loyal of friends, for his own perfect integrity of character gave him the true wisdom of life. He ever discerned what was of real and abiding worth, and helped all who sought his counsel how to discern the true proportion of means to end. "In quietness and confidence shall be thy strength." It was the true secret of his life. And therefore it is a fragrant memory which he leaves behind as a noble legacy to all who knew and loved him. "Blessed are the peacemakers: for they shall be called sons of God."

The funeral, after cremation, was at Dean-row on Tuesday, the service being conducted by the Revs. C. T. Poynting and E. L. H. Thomas. Owen's College was represented by the Principal and others; Manchester College, Oxford, of whose committee Mr. Nicholson was a member, was represented by Messrs. Harry Rawson, J. H. Brooks and H. P. Greg.

THOMAS SHELMERDINE.

The village of Heyrod, half-way between Stalybridge and Mossley, has just lost one of its most useful and respected inhabitants. Mr. Shelmerdine had for some time suffered from a lingering and painful disease, and after a severe operation, he died, on 15th inst., at the age of sixty. All his life he was connected with the Union Sunday-school at Heyrod, conducted by Unitarians, Methodists, and members of other denominations. He became a scholar in the school in 1845, when he would be a mere child. He joined the Burial Society in 1846, and in succession became teacher, committee-man, auditor, secretary, treasurer, superintendent, and trustee and manager of the day-school. He held some of these offices at the time of his death. He worked in the one employ for forty years. Mr. Shelmerdine was a well-informed man, very modest and retiring. He was greatly respected in his native village, and at Stalybridge and Mossley. He and his family were members of the Stalybridge congregation.

The funeral took place last Saturday, the memorial service, conducted by the Rev. W. Harrison, being held in the Heyrod schoolroom. The room was crowded by Mr. Shelmerdine's friends and neighbours, and signs of mourning were visible throughout the village, every blind being drawn. The remains were afterwards buried at St. Paul's Church, Stalybridge, Mr. Harrison conducting the service at the graveside. W. H.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

Whitsuntide.

I wonder whether all the children who are going to read this column have seen a water-mill. I want to tell you about one that, sixty years ago, ground the corn for the people who lived in the village of West Roxbury in the United States. But, first of all, you must hear about the village. It was such a quiet, pretty, country place. Lanes led from one farm or cottage to another, and round the village, and between the houses, were meadows where the village children used to play in summer-time.

There was a little church, too, where on sunny Sundays the shadows of the trees which surrounded it made leafy pictures on the walls inside, and sweet country scents were wafted in through the open windows.

But, perhaps, what was really the nicest point about West Roxbury was that stream which flowed down from the hills, breaking into little falls over the cliff that stood in its way, and rushing down its steep rocky bed with such force that by the time it reached the great mill-wheel it had power to turn it slowly round. The face of the old mill, to which the wheel was fastened, was quite green with beautiful mosses and ferns that grew in the chinks between its stones; for they were always kept damp by the spray from the wheel. Then when the mill was passed the stream flowed on quietly through the fields, and the prettiest flowers were always to be found upon its banks. So I fancy the children of West Roxbury had many favourite play-places near their beautiful stream; and when one Sunday morning, the minister, whom they all knew so well, began to speak in his sermon about the mill-wheel and the water from the hill that turned it round and round, they were eager to hear what he was going to say.

And this was something like what he told them, in such simple words that even the little ones among them could understand—that as the stream for ever flowing down from the hill-top gave the mill-wheel power to grind the corn inside the mill, so, to the soul of every person who asked Him for it, God's strength would flow and help him to do his daily work and live the beautiful, useful helping life He wishes us all to lead.

Now you see this simple little sermon about the mill-wheel which the children could understand so well was really a sermon about the most mighty, wonderful influence there is—about the inspiration of God, by which we mean the breathing of His Holy Spirit into our souls; the whispers and the messages from Him which all of us, who watch for them, receive.

Inspiration is a long word, and there have been pages on pages written about it, for it is a great subject; but, for all that, it has a very simple meaning. Some one said once: "We speak to God—that is prayer; God speaks to us—that is inspiration." So inspiration means just the help our spirits have from God. And think how often this help comes to us every day—how often God breathes His spirit into us, and in how many ways. Perhaps we are tempted to do or say something wrong, and the voice within seems to whisper "Don't"—there is a message from God to us. We hear of a noble deed done, perhaps, and we long to follow the grand example and be noble and true ourselves. That longing and high resolve are breathed into us by God; they are inspirations from Him which we must obey if we would make our lives good and faithful to the right. See how many helps and encouragements come to us each day—how the words of friends help us, and the books we read, and how good thoughts come to us, we know not whence. All these are messages from God, inspirations from His Spirit to our own; and if we listen to them and do as they tell us, they will come to us oftener and oftener.

Whitsuntide is close at hand, and on Whit Sunday you will very likely hear read the story from the Book of Acts which tells us how 1800 years ago God sent His Holy Spirit—an inspiration—to the Apostles as they sat together in sadness, after the death of Christ, waiting in Jerusalem to receive the strength from God which would make their fearful hearts brave and strong. We read of the cloven tongues of fire and the mighty rushing wind with which the Spirit came to them, and the words seem strange to us; for we know that to us God's messages come silently into our waiting souls. But at all events we learn from the story, and this is what matters most to us, that those poor, ignorant, down-hearted fishermen knew that the Spirit of God was working in their hearts; and with this knowledge they went out into the world, ready even to die if they could best serve God in that way.

And so we keep Whitsuntide as a festival in memory of the wonderful outpouring of the Holy Spirit which made that little band of men so brave and true.

Think, too, of all the great men and women who have helped the world so much by the lives they led and the grand characters they built up within themselves. It was by the Spirit of God, by His inspirations, that they became what they were. Do you not like the story of brave William Lloyd Garrison, of America, who had neither friends nor money to help him, and found the world was against him when he set himself to free the slaves and put an end to the great wrong of slavery? "One with God is a majority," he said to himself; and by this he meant that if the right was on his side he was so sure of God's help that he was certain to succeed. And the great work he set himself to do by God's help was done.

For us, even if we are children just beginning life, there are inspirations and helps from God, whispers which warn us not to do wrong, and longings within us to reach up to what is beautiful and true and good.

Let us trust them all, and obey every "little whisper of the soul," and keep in our memories all the year round the thoughts that Whitsuntide brings to us.

OUR WHIT-WEEK FESTIVAL.

IT is a happy fortune that gives us Whit-week for our New Century meetings. This festival of the Church Universal is the most fitting for the purpose that is to bring our people together from near and far, and to bring to us honoured and welcome guests from many lands. In one spirit we desire to be together, consecrated anew to better service, with clearer vision of truth, a quicker sense of duty, and a stronger hold on righteousness, a larger charity in judging of the thought and the action of others, and a more perfect love in which to be devoted to our work, to minister to the needs of our fellow-men. In one spirit—and that is the Spirit of the Eternal, who is Truth and Righteousness and Love; of whose hidden presence in the heart of JESUS and in the lives of the first disciples came all that was pure and good in that distant age and the victorious uprising of the Christian Church; of whom has been every new baptism of the Spirit since then, which has come for the cleansing and uplifting of mankind, the wakening of the people to a better manhood and a humbler trust in the living GOD. Whitsuntide is the great festival of gladness which marks the faith of the Christian world in that holy presence of the Spirit, the divine power of renewal and fresh inspiration, and the gift of better life which is not denied to "humble men of heart."

It is a happy fortune that makes it possible for us to meet together at this time; and if we dare to make this festival our own, as indeed we do, it is because we earnestly desire those better gifts, because we know that there is none other to whom we can look, and that our strength must be in GOD alone. What may be given to us at this time we cannot tell, but we know that there is no other source of life and inspiration, and we know the spirit in which we must come together, to be prepared and wait for gifts from the Most High. We know that there is a unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace; and the witness of the Spirit we rejoice to find universal as our common humanity. Most richly known to us in the mind of Christ, it extends even beyond the dominion of his gracious influence, and with wholehearted brotherly love we can welcome our kindred from the distant East, whose home has not been as ours in the Christian community, and those of our own land whose loyalty has not yet been won to the discipleship which is so much to us, who yet desire to be with us as worshippers of the living GOD.

The fruits of the Spirit we were taught of old, and each generation has proved it true, are love, joy, and peace. We therefore come together to seek these things, and at the beginning of a new century desire that they may be given to us abundantly. The week's festival unites many interests in one common purpose. Fitly the first gatherings will be of the teachers of the young, with whom is the promise of the future. Among them the spirit of rejoicing and of hope is most habitual, and that will strike the right keynote for all the week. Then come meetings the interest of which centres in the welfare of our Free Churches, seeking for a new power of ministry and closer bonds of brotherly fellowship in a common work. And lastly, the meetings of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers, whose object is "to open communication with those in all lands who are striving to unite pure religion and perfect liberty, and to increase fellowship and co-operation among them," and of whom it has been declared that they, of whatever name or fellowship, "desire to work together in the spirit of freedom and the love of truth, for the religious enlightenment and uplifting of the world."

At each step the outlook widens, and the conviction grows deeper that it must all be in the one Spirit—whether in the home gathering or in school for the children, leading them through the discipline of duty and the touch of sympathy to a knowledge of goodness and of the FATHER'S love; whether in the church in the communion of worship and thanksgiving and ministering to the needs of man, or bearing testimony to the world of divine truth, seeking a larger brotherhood and the dawning of a better day—there is One in whom alone all our works can prosper, with whom alone can be that true freedom which is of the Spirit, from whom alone can come to us the light and the more abundant life for which we hope and pray. Thus it is that we may find the secret of true gladness in our festival, because it is in humility and trustfulness and hope that we shall come together, because however various our posts of duty, our one prayer shall be that not our will, but the FATHER'S will, may be done.

OUR GUESTS.

At the first session of the International Council on Thursday morning, after the President's opening address, the first business will be to offer a very cordial welcome to the foreign delegates present. Some of these, our expected guests, are already old friends; others, before Thursday is here, we shall doubtless feel to have been always our friends.

Of Mr. Wendté, the Secretary of the International Council, we published last week a biographical sketch, and here only remind our readers again that on Sunday morning they will have the first opportunity of hearing him in Little Portland-street Chapel.

Of Dr. Crothers we published an account in the previous number, and have since been reading his volume of six sermons, "Members of One Body," published in 1892, sermons which take Roman Catholicism, Calvinism, Methodism, Ritualism and Mysticism in turn, not so much to criticise as to draw out the best that is in them, and finally to show what must be the true Unity of Christendom. We commend also to our readers a striking essay by Dr. Crothers, "The Faith of a Free Church," which will be found in the Book Room at Essex Hall.

M. Jean Réville does not contribute a paper to this Conference, but is to be one of the speakers at the meeting at Westminster Town Hall. He bears a name long honoured in Liberal Religious circles, and comes to us now doubly welcome, as the son of Albert Réville, and as himself a leader of liberal Protestantism in Paris and a scholar of achieved distinction. M. Albert Réville will perhaps be best known to our readers as the author of "A Life of Theodore Parker," and the little book on "The History of the Dogma of the Deity of Christ," and as Hibbert Lecturer in 1884 on "The Religions of Mexico and Peru." M. Jean Réville, who was born at Rotterdam in 1854, has been for nearly twenty years settled in Paris, where, following in the line of his distinguished father's special studies, he is now Professor of the History of Religions.

Among our other guests from Paris are M. Ernest Fontanes, who is to read the paper on "The Contribution of France to Religious Progress," and Professor Bonet-Maury, to whom we are so greatly indebted for his masterly work on "Early Sources of English Unitarianism."

The Rev. James Hocart has long been a familiar and welcome presence at our anniversary meetings, and his brave and patient work at Brussels is well known. Concerning the Rev. F. C. Fleischer, and the most interesting body of liberal Mennonites in Holland, we have already published a brief note, and look forward with the utmost interest to hearing more from him of the religious movement he represents.

From Holland come also Dr. B. D. Eerdmans, who now holds Kuenen's chair as Professor of Old Testament and the History of the Religion of Israel at Leiden, and the Rev. P. H. Hugenholtz, of Amsterdam, who is the official representative of the Protestanten Bond.

Mr. Vladimir Tchertkoff is a Russian exile, and a friend of Tolstoy's. His presence at our meetings will be welcomed with the keenest sympathy. He was largely instrumental in making known the condition of the persecuted Doukhobors in Russia, and enlisting the sympathy and generous help especially of the Society of Friends, by which the emigration of the sufferers to Canada has now been happily accomplished. We commend to our readers the new edition of Mr. Tchertkoff's "Christian Martyrdom in Russia" (1s.), which contains the story of the deliverance. This and a number of booklets by Tolstoy are issued from the Free Age Press, now removed from Malden, in Essex, to Christchurch, Hants, where Mr. Tchertkoff is now established. Mr. Tchertkoff is greatly interested in Unitarian literature, and with the co-operation of the B. and F.U.A. is at present engaged in translating some popular leaflets into Russian.

The Unitarians of Hungary will be represented by the Rev. N. Jozan, minister of the Church at Budapest, who from 1892 to 1895 was a student at Manchester College, Oxford. Our old friend and correspondent, Dr. George Boros, of Kolozsvar, to his and our very great regret, is after all unable to come.

The Rev. Professor Edouard Montet, D.D., will represent the liberal Protestantism of Switzerland. Dr. Montet is Dean of the Faculty of Theology in the University of Geneva, and THE INQUIRER would offer him a welcome of special cordiality as editor of Le Progrès Religieux, a fortnightly journal, with the motto, "Gospel and Liberty," established three years ago. Dr. Montet is also the author of an admirably illustrated manual of the "History of the People of Israel according to the Old Testament," a little book which has run through several editions, and has been translated into German. It is designed as a basis of religious instruction in elementary schools. We understand that Dr. Montet is to attend the tercentenary celebrations of the Protestant Theological School of Montauban in the week after next, and to our regret will not be able to join our other foreign friends in their visit to Oxford.

There are other of our guests from Germany, Italy, Denmark, &c., of whom, had time and space permitted, we should have been glad to add some notes; for some of these we may refer our readers to the special number of the New Kingdom, noticed last week, where also a number of portraits will be found.

SABBATH IN MAY.

SABBATH is on the world, and I
Lay down my toil. A stillness holds
The air, the trees against the sky—
And all the Eternal Arm enfolds.

Sweet is the incense of the pines,
And upward from the broken clod,
Cloven in brown and fertile lines,
The earth exhales the breath of God.

The suppliant earth entreats the sky,
The drenching clouds fulfil the prayer;
The suppliant heart puts forth its cry,
And peace and gratitude are there.

The wind is loosened in the West
And gently floods the upper skies;
The sun uplifts his golden crest;
Warm in his beams the woodland lies.

Alternate is the sunshine brought
Where shadows on the hills reclined,
While shades of drifting clouds of thought
Pass o'er the meadows of the mind.

With music slumbering in their bells,
Slow, up the slope the flock is driven;
On hills of hope the spirit dwells,
Forgiving all, of God forgiven.

Sabbath is on the world. To greet
In love, and bless the day's release,
Slowly along the village street
Go listeners for the word of peace.

WHIT-WEEK RECEPTIONS.

SIR,—The present number of THE INQUIRER contains the sad tidings of the death of our excellent and generous friend, Miss J. Durning Smith, and I am sure the heartfelt sympathy of all who had the privilege of knowing her will be with Sir Edwin and Lady Durning-Lawrence in their sad bereavement.

It will be obvious that this must affect the arrangements for next week. But with their characteristic consideration Sir Edwin and Lady Durning-Lawrence are unwilling to cause disappointment. Sir John and Lady Brunner, also with great kindness, have wished to facilitate the change of plans, which is this:—That instead of separate receptions at Carlton-house-terrace and Ennismore-gardens from 9 to 11.30, there will now be a united reception at the Grafton Galleries (off Bond-street, Piccadilly) from 8 to 11 o'clock.

Those who have already accepted invitations are requested on their arrival in London to call at Essex Hall, and exchange their cards for new ones, which contain the necessary particulars.

JAMES HARWOOD,
Chairman of the General Arrangements Committee.

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE GUILDS' UNION.

SIR,—Mr. Bowie writes me that in consequence of pressure at Essex Hall, the meeting to inaugurate the National Conference Guilds' Union must be held elsewhere. Delegates and others interested will please notice that the meeting will be held at Little Portland-street Chapel, on Thursday, May 30, at 2.30 P.M. I sincerely hope that the object of this very important gathering will not suffer from this necessary alteration of plan.

May I take this opportunity of stating that the objects of the proposed Union are:—

"1. To promote the formation of Guilds in connection with the churches on the roll of the National Conference, which should aim at uniting the young people, together with the various workers of our congregations and schools, into a league of fellowship to (a) foster religious life, and (b) inspire personal service.

"2. To promote the efficiency of Guilds as factors in religious work and worship by means of a common manual, literature, meetings, conferences, and any other methods which from time to time may be adopted."

All interested in these objects are cordially invited to the meeting.

JOHN ELLIS.

CENTRAL POSTAL MISSION AND UNITARIAN WORKERS' UNION.

SIR,—Since my last letter concerning the co-operative tour to Transylvania I have received, through Mr. Boros, a most kind invitation offering free quarters in Kolozsvár to the whole party.

A Hungarian gentleman will meet the party in Vienna and arrange the tour so as to include as many points of interest as possible in the time.

Further details will be announced, and a welcome offered by one of the Hungarian delegates at the Central Postal Mission Public Meeting at Essex Hall at 2.30 on Tuesday next, May 28.

On Whit-Sunday afternoon, May 26, the President and Secretary will be "at home" to any friends or delegates who may like to come to Manor Lodge from 2.30 to 7. M. L. TAGART.

Manor Lodge, Frognal-lane, Hampstead, N.W.

"JOHN POUND'S HOME."

SIR,—May I ask through your paper if the friends, who have so kindly helped the "John Pound's Home" in times past, will help us in our present need?

The assistance given to young girls through the home since its opening is sufficient proof of its value.

Many of our girls come to us from rough homes, ragged and dirty, through no fault of theirs, often through no fault of their parents. If no one helps them they can only obtain the roughest places, where they are often over-worked and treated as young charwomen. Under such circumstances it is not astonishing that they are disheartened and will do anything rather than remain in service.

We are trying to help a few of these girls to become pure, useful women, by giving them a short training in the home, then putting them out into carefully-chosen places where they can get a general knowledge of service. If they continue satisfactory, after a year or so, we hope to find them higher posts.

Friends will help us greatly by sending us left-off garments, old table linen, bedding, &c. We should be very grateful to any ladies who would like to help us with the outfitting of the girls by promising us one or more garments a year, such as underclothing, morning and afternoon aprons, &c., and thus form a "John Pound's Needlework Guild." By this means the "many hands" will not only make our work lighter, but our burden also. MARY H. G. LEE, Matron.

"John Pound's Home," 79, St. Thomas-street, Portsmouth.

THE FRAMLINGHAM MANSE.

SIR,—The following may be interesting. I am not yet able to identify the occasion of the alteration of 1681, but hope to succeed.

A MS. account of Framlingham Manor, date 1724, states that "Richard Clark holdeth one Burgeus, and a quarter of a Burgeus which was Thomas Clark's 1659 by the annual rent of 6*d*."

Loder's "History of Framlingham," published 1798, also contains this information, and a copy that I have seen to-day has a note in the margin—"Toms next the Old Meeting House" (Samuel Say Toms was minister from 1773 to 1829). This property was purchased about 1756 "by the leading members of the congregation for the residence of their minister."

In "The Meeting House Book A" (1730–1835) are the following entries:—"1763, Note that £20 given in Mr. Wright's will, to the Meeting at Framlingham, together with £10 out of Mrs. Sarah Green's legacy is appropriated to the payment of £30 borrowed of Mr. Freeman towards the purchase of Minister's house." "1767, Mr. Stuck to have £— and Parsonage" (Rev. W. Stuck was minister from 1767 to 1769). There is every reason for believing that the building dates back quite two centuries beyond 1681. But that it was at one time an inn is very doubtful. I have made careful investigation, and so far, have found no evidence.

May 21. ALFRED AMEY.

MANCHESTER DISTRICT.

SIR,—In my recent Provincial Letter I briefly described the changed conditions in the ministerial arrangements at Heaton Moor and Urmston. May I state a little more fully how matters really stand. The Rev. Priestley Prime was appointed Superintendent Missionary of the Association over two years ago, to have charge of both Heaton Moor and Urmston. During this period he has discharged the duties of his office with zeal and ability; but the time has now come when it is felt that instead of one Superintendent Missionary for both places, there should be a settled minister at each place, owing to the increase of work and the growing needs of churches with buildings of their own. As a consequence the Rev. Priestley Prime's engagement terminates at the end of June next. Up to the present, however, no fresh appointments have been made. The two churches will now make their own appointments, and not the Association as heretofore, subject only to the usual conditions laid down in connection with grant-aided churches.

CHARLES ROPER.

LONDON SUNDAY SCHOOL SOCIETY.

SIR,—Referring to my letter as to the Whit-Sunday services at Essex Hall (at 3.30) for scholars and at Little Portland-street chapel (at 7) for teachers and churchworkers, I am made by an amusing piece of "printer's devilry" to ask London ministers and Sunday-school superintendents to "make themselves known." This is highly desirable, but I meant by my hieroglyphics to ask the ministers and superintendents to "make these services known." May I now make the request.

HOWARD YOUNG.

LOST.

SIR,—Kindly help me to recover MS. music of my play Dick Whittington, which I lent to some Sunday-school last winter, and which has never been returned. I have, unfortunately, lost the name of the school. I find great carelessness on the part of superintendents with respect to my MSS., and often have to write requesting return. H. W. HAWKES.

LET us cultivate the good ordering by the mind; let us be tranquil. Let us live constantly and consciously in the peace that passeth understanding. We can do it and do it now. We need not delay. The power is within each one of us. It only remains for us really to desire it, and then to maintain our position after once taking our stand.—K. Newcomb.

THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE seventy-sixth Report of the Committee to be presented to the annual meeting of the Association on Wednesday next has been issued to members, and as we shall not have much space next week to devote to the meeting, we propose here to give in advance some account of this most interesting document.

In view of the special interest of the occasion, this first report of the new century appears in a more attractive form, with a new cover, with a reproduction from Emslie's portrait of Dr. Martineau as frontispiece. Under the portrait it is noted that Dr. Martineau was a subscriber to the funds of the Association to the end of his life, and that he twice preached the annual sermon, in 1834 and 1869.

The Report opens as follows:—

For upwards of three-quarters of the nineteenth century, the British and Foreign Unitarian Association has held its place and performed its work; and if the three Societies out of which it was formed in 1825 are taken into account, its operations covered the whole century. Great and numerous changes have occurred in the thought and life of the Unitarian body during this period, but the Association has succeeded in adapting itself to varying and progressive needs. This is largely owing to the enlightened and generous spirit of its early founders. It was no narrow, dogmatic, exclusive, and sectarian purpose which these men had in view. Religion to them consisted of being and doing, as well as of knowing. Truth and love were linked, not separated, in their thought and experience. The first annual report, in referring to a letter from Dr. E. S. Gannett, the Secretary of the American Unitarian Association (founded the day before the British and Foreign Unitarian Association), expresses the hope that both societies may work for truth, freedom, and universal brotherhood; the second report, published in 1827, says that the Association was "for the promotion of pure, unadulterated Christianity, for the diffusion of brotherly love, and for the advancement of the high interests of religious liberty." The late Dr. Martineau, in the sermon which he preached at the annual meeting of the Association in May, 1834, declared that "the triumph of its doctrines would be, not the ascendancy of one sect, but the harmony of all."

The Association is avowedly "Unitarian," but this has never prevented its members and successive committees from entering into hearty sympathy and fellowship, wherever possible, at home or abroad, with all seekers of truth, all doers of right, all lovers of man, all believers in God. Small in numbers, holding an insignificant position compared with the big battalions of "orthodoxy," Unitarians have spoken their word and done their work with the desire of promoting true religion; and not, as some seem to think, for the purpose of offering men a barren and negative theology.

The religious outlook in this country, in America, and on the Continent, at the opening of the new century, so far from showing that there is no longer any need for such an Association, is evidence that the need is in many ways greater than ever. The forces of materialism and indifference to religion are arrayed on one side; on the other, the claims of an aggressive priesthood are being pushed forward with a courage and persistence which fill not a few sober minds with alarm and dread. The kingdom of God, in the world and in the soul of man, is ignored or despised, and "the true problem of life which is to incorporate the ideal in our actual" awaits solution: a reasonable and reverent religion offers the only satisfactory or helpful solution. In our own and in other lands, clericalism remains the open or secret foe of religious freedom, truth, and love; creeds and formularies which have ceased to bear any truthful relation to the facts of the universe, of history, or the experience of man, are publicly recited in churches, and taught in schools, as if they were absolutely true. Individuals in the most creed-bound churches think and act freely, but ecclesiastical systems, whether supported by the State or by a priesthood, seem incapable of progressive growth. A Canon of the Anglican Church may declare that the damnatory clauses of the Athanasian Creed are "cancelled and rejected by the best conscience of our time"; but a Dean of the same Church sorrowfully reminds us that "although as long ago as fifty years the Upper House of Convocation argued that some modification of the Church's rules is needful, we go on as if smitten with apoplexy, and nothing is done." The free position occupied by Unitarians, all through their history, has enabled them to retain and cherish whatever is true and good in the teachings of the past, to welcome whatever is noble and helpful in the teachings of the present, and to keep an open mind for any truer or better revelations which the future may have in store for man.

The Report gives a summary of the work of the past year, a large part of which was embodied in the report to the Council, published in full in THE INQUIRER of April 20. During 1900, grants to the amount of £2,237 were made to sixty-seven churches in England and Wales, and in addition to further special help for buildings in this country, grants were made in aid of the ministry at Auckland (New Zealand), Brussels, Budapest, Copenhagen, Melbourne, and Sydney, while £100 was contributed towards the cost of a new Unitarian church at Ottawa, the capital of Canada. The McQuaker Fund is administered for the benefit of Unitarianism in Scotland, and the Association is now helping to support a McQuaker, a Hungarian, an Indian, and a Japanese student at Manchester College, Oxford. The Report having recorded the publications of the year, gives a full account of the admirable work done by the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams in India from October, 1898, until the present time, when he is on his way home. It then refers to the need of watchfulness in the matter of Civil rights, records the American meetings of last year, and gives a forecast of the coming Whit-week national and international meetings.

After a summary of the year's finance, which shows that the £225 received as legacies has been used to meet current expenses, leaving on a total of £5,006 2s. a balance of £40 7s. 7d. in hand, the Report concludes as follows:—

The funds of the Association are employed for the purpose of establishing, extending, and supporting Unitarian principles and work at home and abroad. Every penny received in subscriptions and donations is expended in grants to churches and ministers. No part of the country is overlooked by the Committee. The smallest struggling congregation receives advice and help; solitary inquirers living in places remote from any Unitarian chapel are provided with theological and devotional literature. The Association, with its record of seventy-six years' arduous and devoted service, merits the continued loyalty and the increased support of Unitarians throughout the length and breadth of the United Kingdom. The Committee appeal with confidence to ministers and laity alike to rally round the Association and give it the sympathy and financial aid required for carrying on and pushing forward its good work. Ecclesiastical authority or controlling functions the Association has neither the desire nor the right to claim over individuals or churches, but it does aspire to render active encouragement and generous assistance to the cause of true religion; and it welcomes the co-operation of all who with clear minds and pure hearts find "their highest enthusiasm in worshipping the Father in spirit and in truth, and their most engrossing exercise in ready strength and eager toil, living and spending themselves for every good work of love and service, alone or in strenuous combination." The Unitarian message is a Catholic and a Christian message. To render assistance in proclaiming this message among men by word and work, as opportunity offers—to encourage men to live by the light of its truth and the warmth of its love, and to render service to others in its spirit of brotherhood—is the task to which the Committee desire to devote their energies.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

FOR the same reason as in the case of the B. and F.U.A. we give here a summary of the Report of the Association to be presented to the annual meeting on Tuesday next.

The Report opens with an interesting historical account of the Association, in which we find its origin traced to a meeting held at Coles-street, Aug. 9, 1833, under the presidency of the Rev. R. K. Philp, when the three Sunday-schools at Worship-street, Coles-street, and Spicer-street agreed to form a union for "mutual information, encouragement, and assistance," and to invite other schools to join. The first annual meeting was held at the White Hart, Bishopsgate, in May, 1834, beginning with breakfast at half-past seven, thus establishing a good old custom, to be revived, though not at quite so virtuous an hour, at the meeting next week. At that meeting Dr. Lant Carpenter took the chair, and Dr. Tuckerman, who was on a visit to this country, was among the speakers. Trowbridge and Ditchling and another London school had joined the Union, making six in all. By 1843 there were forty schools included, and the Northern S. S. A. of Ireland led the way as a district union by joining the Association. In 1845 the Manchester District S. S. A. was formed, and in 1848 the Midland District Association, followed a few months later by the London S. S. S. The founding of this latter society was due to the vigorous initiative of Mr. I. M. Wade, to whose fifty years of devoted service our Sunday-schools throughout the country owe so much.

The first publications of the Association were issued in 1837, being three booklets edited by the Rev. W. Vidler, the secretary. In 1839 Miss Emily Taylor's "Old Testament Biography" appeared, and in 1851 what was the most notable early publication, the Rev. Charles Wicksteed's "Commentary of the Gospel of St. Matthew." Twenty years later the Manchester Association issued the first volume of the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed's translation of "The Bible for Young People," a work completed in 1879 by the Central Association. One of the most influential of the books published by the Association is "The First Three Gospels" by the Rev. J. E. Carpenter, which appeared in 1889. These are only a few of a long series of valuable publications, which include Miss F. E. Cooke's delightful biographies, the first volume of which, "Footprints," appeared in 1874, and Dr. Brooke Herford's "Story of Religion in England," published in 1878. The Report also tells of the hymn-books and the magazines and other helps for teachers issued, of which the annual volume of The Helper is the last.

There is much else of great interest in this historical sketch, which concludes with a note on the Oxford Summer Sessions for teachers and the representation of the Association at the Imperial Institute and at the Paris Exhibition last year. We strongly urge all who are interested in Sunday-school work to secure a copy of this valuable record.

Turning to the work of the past year, the Report shows a satisfactory financial position, although the expenditure of the special fund of £350 in supplying schools with literature in the previous year naturally led to a falling-off in the book ales. The new and forthcoming publications are noted, which include, we are glad to see, a volume of The Helper for 1902, to be edited by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant. The "Code Book for Sunday-school Teachers," edited by the Rev. W. C. Bowie, is an outcome of his lecture at the Summer Session at Oxford last year. Five lectures on "Travel and Life in Palestine" have been prepared by the Rev. J. T. Sunderland, illustrated by a large number of lantern slides, the cost of the whole being over £50, and particulars are given as to the conditions on which the slides can be borrowed.

The Report concludes with some particulars as to the eight District Unions connected with the Association.

ASSOCIATION OF IRISH NON-SUBSCRIBING PRESBYTERIAN AND OTHER FREE CHURCHES.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL CONFERENCE.

ON Saturday, May 18, a conference of teachers and friends was held at Comber, the associated schools being well represented.

After luncheon, hospitably served in the schoolroom, the Conference was constituted in the Meeting House, when the Rev. M. S. Dunbar, the President, took the chair. There were upwards of 190 persons present.

After hymn and prayer offered by the PRESIDENT, the Rev. THOS. DUNKERLEY welcomed the Conference to Comber.

The Rev. W. H. DRUMMOND introduced the subject of "Services for Children," in which he spoke of the necessity of training children to habits of worship, and of making them feel that the church belongs to them as to upgrown people, and urged that the services be such as to appeal to the mind and heart of a child. The idea that the church is a dull place required to be removed from the minds of children. The atmosphere of the church should be such as to conduce to the spirit of worship. He preferred a simple liturgical form of worship for children. Variety was needed. The service should not be long, and children should have some part in it—such as simple responses. Sermons or addresses were not of necessity part of a children's service. Generally, sermons to children consisted of a common-place story with a very obvious moral, in which both story and moral were spoiled. Sermons to children should not exceed ten minutes. There should be no manuscript between speaker and children. He commended the catechetical form of instruction.

In the discussion which followed, the Rev. R. LYTTLE thought the catechetical system not suited to that part of Ireland. Liturgical services, if tried, would appear to be a failure for a time, but would eventually deepen the devotional life of the children.

Rev. J. A. KELLY considered a liturgy not suitable, and advocated shortness in addresses.

Rev. D. WALMSLEY had tried both liturgical and other forms of service, and thought liturgical services tended to too great familiarity and consequent want of reverence. Of all things, the story and moral was the most pestilential.

Miss MALCOLM felt the desirability of having children's services, and approved a liturgical form, if it embodied variety.

Miss LINDSAY said her ideal service for children was that they should go with their parents to the ordinary services. The habit of attention, quietude, and reverence would grow. Children often understood as much as an ordinary minister was able to give.

Miss DAVIDSON urged regular children's services.

REV. W. J. DAVIES spoke of a Welsh custom of services conducted entirely by the laity, and the musical recitation of verses from the Bible. He advocated prize-giving to scholars to encourage attendance at church services.

Mrs. ORMISTON CHANT said there was no objection to children getting accustomed to a particular form of prayer. Rather teach prayer in a mechanical form than let a child grow up without prayer. Mothers taught children one very familiar simple prayer. In addresses there should be a for ever bubbling up fountain of interest. A march round to a lively tune was training into discipline.

Other speeches followed, and Mr. DRUMMOND, in responding to a vote of thanks, said as to liturgical services becoming too familiar and leading to listlessness all depended upon the spirit in which we entered worship. Rhythmic movement might be made an agency of spiritual teaching, and a processional hymn would be good for children.

After the Conference as the day was delightfully fine tea was served in the grounds about the Meeting House and Manse, and votes of thanks concluded a meeting which was unanimously voted a conspicuous success in every way.

THERE is nothing we cannot overcome;
Say not thy evil instinct is inherited,
Or that some trait inborn makes thy whole life forlorn,
And calls down punishment that is not merited.

Back of thy parents and grandparents lies
The great Eternal Will: that, too, is thine
Inheritance—strong, beautiful, divine,
Sure lever of success for one who tries.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

LONDON.

During the past weeks and months of organising and preparation, those who were busiest in the work were most confident that the New Century meetings would be, at least numerically, a great success. Writing on the eve of the feast, it is no question of confidence. The invitation to attend has been so numerously accepted that the only ground of apprehension is whether the rooms engaged will be large enough for the several assemblies. When we hear that the Secretary has signed and forwarded upwards of a thousand railway forms to friends at a distance, and remember that a host of friends in and about London are supplementary to these travellers from afar, it is evident that no ordinary provision would suffice. The provision, therefore, will be extraordinary; and it is hoped that, with the courteous consideration of our guests, we in London may not unworthily bear the duties of hospitality which devolve upon us.

Setting aside, as well as we may, our Martha-like cares and anxieties, it will possibly help some and interest others if a note or two is offered, chiefly by way of hints to visitors. The neat and handy guide issued by the Committee of General Arrangements contains a very full programme, but, once analysed, the scheme as a whole can be easily borne in mind.

First, it will be observed that the Sunday-school takes the precedence in time, if not also in importance. The London schools (elder scholars) will assemble on Sunday afternoon at Essex Hall, when the Rev. J. Page Hopps will tell the story of "The King's Son in Egypt." In the evening the Rev. A. N. Blatchford will hold a service for teachers and others at Little Portland-street Chapel. On the morrow comes Bank Holiday, and "personally conducted tours" to places of interest in the city and district will be the order of the day—for those who wish to avail themselves of the kind services of a score or more conductors, and of the generous hospitality of numerous hosts. It may be well to warn strangers to London that a good many of the ordinary restaurants are closed on Whit-Monday, so that they had better keep an eye on their commissariat for that day. We believe it is not all avec intention that the Temperance Association is to meet in the evening of a day when the evidence of a ready supply of one class of refreshment is only too easily met in the streets. On Tuesday the Sunday School Association meets and for this occasion revives its ancient and laudable custom of "breakfast" before business. The resources of the providers are happily ample enough to meet the requirements of the huge company expected; and the feast of reason and flow of soul will not, we trust, suffer by comparison.

The Sunday-school having thus had its turn, there are fitted in on Tuesday afternoon a couple of interesting and important meetings—namely, that of the Central Postal Mission, and a public meeting to receive a report from the Superannuation Committee appointed at the Leicester Conference.

The evening of Tuesday is to unite all friends of all the societies, schools, churches, councils, guilds, associations, and "whomsoever will" besides, in a religious service at St. James's Hall, preceded by communion service at Little Portland-street. Mr. John Harrison, of Brixton, who will act as organist, will have a large choir of volunteers from many churches near and remote; and Mr. Mackie, of Islington, will have a large staff of stewards to assist ticket-holders to their seats, and as far as possible to attend to the needs of others present. Remembering the attractiveness of the preacher, the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke, for a large circle in London not otherwise closely connected with our churches, it will be well for all intending worshippers to be in time.

The same advice may be respectfully offered to friends who have marked Wednesday morning's meeting—the annual meeting of the B. and F.U.A.—as one of their engagements. This meeting will be preceded by a Devotional Service, as will be the meetings on Thursday and Friday also. The B. and F.U.A. may be said to claim Wednesday as it own, there being a Conference in the afternoon and the popular conversazione in the evening.

On Thursday and Friday the International Council of Unitarians and others will hold its meetings, and its programme is undeniably full enough for the whole two days to itself. But in the afternoon of Thursday three other meetings are to be held—namely, a Sunday-school Societies' Delegates' meeting, a Ministerial Conference, and the Inaugural Meeting of the Guilds' Union which has been organised by the Committee of the National Conference. Friends of the last-named movement must carefully observe that, owing to the number of meetings being held at the time in Essex Hall, this meeting will he held, not at that hall, as originally announced, but at Little Portland-street. In the evening the public meeting will be held, at Westminster Town Hall; and here, it should be said, arrangements have been made for an "overflow meeting" which is pretty certain to take place. It may interest some to know beforehand that one of the "Internationals" will probably address this meeting in his own language—which is not English, nor "American," but French. Friday's meetings belong to the International Council only, but guests are not likely to forget the "receptions" arranged for the afternoon and evening.

A word or two as to the special programme of the International Council. On Thursday morning, after the Presidential Address (Professor Carpenter) and welcome to delegates, two papers on subjects of widely inclusive interest will be read. In the afternoon the papers will be of a sectional character, dealing respectively with religious life in France, Belgium, Holland, Russia, and Hungary ("Folk-lore"); and a glance at the time-table shows that these are to be brief statements rather than full descriptions.

On Friday afternoon again a similar series is arranged to include reference to Italy, Hungary ("Religious Problems"), Germany, and the United States. The morning programme includes what will no doubt be thought some of the most important subjects, and the names of the readers need no emphasis here. All we can say is "Be in time."

Yes, we can say one more thing, and that will be welcomed alike by those who are so unfortunate as to be crowded out at any of these meetings of the Council, and by those who cannot attend at all. The papers, read or unread (for it is clear that time will not allow all the promised papers to be read), will surely all be published in due course, whether in these columns or in some other form.

And what else? Only a printed record and nothing more? Surely not. "Why this waste," indeed (some one might say), if it were so—waste of time, energy, unstinted money, much thought. The opportunity is a great one; it would be a pity not to make the most of it. We have been warned against the seductive temptations of puffing ourselves up—"megalomania" is the learned name for it—an evil against which our circumstances usually protect us sufficiently. But if the result next week is a true building-up, and not puffing-up merely; if lonely hearts are gladdened by these hours of fellowship, and mutual counsel, and worshipping together; if old friendships are strengthened and new ones are born; if individual aims are merged into one sacred purpose, and that the bringing in of the good time that ought to be coming; and if the great Life of all lifts our lives upward and fills them with more of its own truth and love—then it will be good for us hosts and guests, brothers and sisters from far and near to meet thus for this once, to see each other's faces and hear each other's voices before we go away again to our work. So be it.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Boston.—As the old chapel in Spain-lane, after having been closed so long, is in great need of repair, it has been resolved by the ladies of the congregation to hold a bazaar next year. The sum of £200 at least is needed for the various necessary repairs. A new organ and new pews are urgently required, and if funds were forthcoming new windows and a vestry might be well added. At present a square pew curtained off has to do service for the minister's vestry. The ladies are entering earnestly into this enterprise, and they will be glad of any outside help either in the shape of money contributions or articles for the bazaar, which may be sent to Mrs. Stoddart, 41, Tunnard-street.

Bristol: Lewin's Mead Domestic Mission.—On Monday evening, May 20, a meeting of the members of the various clubs and societies connected with the Mission was held in the large hall. The chair was taken by Mr. H. Grice, a member of the Mission Committee. The object of the meeting was to express to the Rev. A. Lancaster the deep regrets of the people of the Mission at the conclusion of his ministry amongst them at the end of the present month. The Chairman voiced the feelings of the meeting by saying that Mr. Lancaster had won their respect and esteem, and that just as they had begun to know him intimately they found to their sorrow that his connection with the Mission was to be broken. He would, however, carry with him the affection of those for whom he had worked so hard, as well as their best wishes for the success and happiness of himself and Mrs. Lancaster in their new sphere of labour at Moretonhampstead. In the name of over fifty subscribers he then presented Mr. Lancaster with a handsome travelling and dressing case as a small token of their esteem and affection. Mr. Lancaster acknowledged the gift and the expressions which accompanied it with much feeling, and said it was a grief to him that he had so soon to separate himself from work which he had loved. He hoped the work would continue successfully under the direction of his successor, whoever he might be, and thanked them sincerely for their hearty good wishes for his future labours. A short time ago Mr. Lancaster was also the recipient of a beautiful edition of the Revised Version of the Bible from the members of the mothers' meeting.

Chatham (Presentation).—The Unitarian Language, Science, and Philosophy Classes have combined and presented to their lecturer, the Rev. G. S. Hitchcock, a set of volumes, including Ladd's "Physiological Pyschology," Wallace on Aristotle's Philosophy, Caird's "Critical Philosophy of Kant," Wallace's "Gifford Lectures," and Sidgwick's "Politics."

Horwich.—On Sunday, May 12, the Sunday-school sermons were preached by the Rev. T. B. Evans, M.A., in the afternoon and evening. In the morning an address to scholars and friends was given by Mr. Isaac Barrow. All the services were well attended, in the evening the chapel being quite filled. Special music was rendered by the children, the choir, and friends. Collections over £11.

London: Mansford-street Church and Mission.—The Rev. W. G. Cadman begs to acknowledge, with thanks, receipt of an anonymous donation of £3 from "Restitution—Spicer-street," which has been placed to the Poor's Purse Account, or other Funds.

London: Peckham (Presentation).—An evening party, given by the Rev. G. and Mrs. Carter on Tuesday last, in the Avondale-road Church school-room, was made the occasion of expressing the great esteem in which Mr. and Mrs. Bredall are held by friends from whom they will shortly be parted by removal from the neighbourhood. The token took the form of a silver fruit and flower epergne, suitably inscribed, and was presented on behalf of the subscribers by the minister of the church. Mr. Bredall, who was for some moments overcome by the surprise, said that the twenty-four years' connection with the church of his wife and himself had been the happiest period of their lives, and though distance might preclude fellowship in worship, membership of the church would be maintained. Later on in the evening Mrs. Bredall also expressed her sense of the loving spirit that had prompted the testimonial. About 100 guests were present on the occasion.

Long Sutton.—On Sunday and Monday, May 12 and 13, the 201st anniversary of this venerable Lincolnshire place of worship was celebrated, and the tenth anniversary of the Rev. W. J. Pond's settlement. The Rev. A. J. Marchant was the preacher on Sunday, and among those who took part in Monday's meeting were Mr. Marchant and the Rev. A. C. Batts, of the local Baptist Church. The presence of visitors from King's Lynn was also much appreciated.

Moretonhampstead (Appointment). — The Rev. A. Lancaster, of Lewin's Mead Domestic Mission, Bristol, has received and accepted a unanimous invitation to become the minister of Cross Chapel, and will enter upon his duties on June 2.

Norwich.—An inspiring and impressive Service of Dedication was held at the Octagon on Sunday evening, May 19, when eleven young men and fourteen young women, between the ages of sixteen and twenty-one, were received by the minister, the Rev. Alfred Hall, M.A., into the fellowship of the church. The service was the outcome of certain classes for the study of religion which had been held by the minister during the winter on alternate Tuesday evenings and on the previous Sunday afternoons. The sermon was based on the text, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you," and appropriate hymns, including Frances Havergal's "Take my life and let it be consecrated, Lord, to Thee" and Gill's "Lord, in the fulness of my might I would for thee be strong," were sung. Afterwards the greater part of the congregation assembled below in the body of the chapel for the communion. The minister delivered a short address to the young people and then welcomed them into the church with the words, "Since you have resolved to live noble lives and to follow to the best of your ability in the footsteps of our Master, Jesus Christ, I welcome you into the fellowship of this church, which is devoted to the worship of Almighty God and the service of man. Receive my right hand in token of that fellowship." After a short lesson from Paul's Epistle to the Ephesians and prayer, the bread and wine were distributed by the minister, Messrs. James Mottram, A. M. Stevens, C. E. Stevens, and W. Finch.

Sunderland.—The chapel anniversary was held on Sunday, May 19, when Miss Lucas, of Harrogate (formerly of Sunderland), preached bright and helpful sermons morning and evening. In the morning there was a large gathering, when the subject was "For Conscience Sake." In the evening the congregation was especially good, and all listened with interest to a discourse on "The Writing on the Wall." Special music was rendered at both services. On Monday, May 20, the annual tea and meeting was held in the chapel. Alderman J. Baxter Ellis, J.P., of Newcastle, presided over a good gathering of members and friends, including visitors from neighbouring chapels. Miss Lucas and the Revs. W. H. Lambelle, A. Harvie, and T. Paxton were among the speakers, and the Rev. F. Wood gave an account of the year's work, in which progress had been shown.

The Scottish Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The first annual meeting was held in South St. Mungo-street Church, Glasgow, on Saturday, May 18. There were present the Revs. R. B. Drummond, B.A., James Forrest, M.A., Henry Williamson, and about forty-five others. After tea the president, Mr. James Graham, took the chair, and in welcoming those present, said he was glad to see such a good meeting. He urged the necessity of spreading our distinctive principles, and argued therefrom the good to be obtained from such a Union as that, which promoted and encouraged co-operation among the teachers, and thereby enabled them to be better fitted to instruct the young. The minutes of the last general meeting, and the secretary's and treasurer's reports, were read and adopted. The secretary was appointed visitor for the year, to visit all the schools affiliated to the Union. The Rev. J. Forrest then read a paper, in which he urged the necessity of having a definite scheme of lessons graduated to suit the different classes in the school. He said that at present there was a great lack of system, which resulted in haphazard teaching, which robbed the children of the good they would otherwise get. It was of great importance that their young people should have clear religious convictions and a rational conception of the Bible. The basis of their scheme of instruction must consist of four things—namely, Religion, Bible, Jesus, and Unitarianism. The history and morality of each were the chief subdivisions under which the various subjects should be taught. It was easy to avoid dogmatism, and there was room for preference and aptitude on the part of the teacher. Having drawn attention to some of the text-books which would be useful to the teachers, he concluded by pointing out the advantage to be derived from the holding of regular children's services. It was agreed to have a scheme drawn up on the lines suggested by Mr. Forrest and sent to the various schools. A resolution of regret at the loss to the Union, caused by the removal of the Rev. A. Ernest Parry from Kirkcaldy to Liscard, coupled with thanks for the work which he did for the Union at its inception, was carried unanimously. A comprehensive vote of thanks was carried with acclamation, and the meeting concluded with hymn and benediction.

Torquay.—Mr. E. B. Russell conducted the service at Unity Hall last Sunday morning, and preached a sermon on "The Foolishness of Preaching," which was well reported in the local Directory.

Wolverhampton.—A successful meeting was held in the Co-operative Hall on Monday evening, May 20, to offer a welcome to the recently-appointed minister to the Unitarian congregation, the Rev. J. Bellamy Higham, B.A. After tea the chair was taken by Mr. H.E. Perry, chairman of the Church Committee, and among the speakers who joined in the welcome to Mr. Higham were the Revs. Dendy Agate, A. A. Charlesworth, and J. C. Street, and Mr. Grosvenor Lee representing the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. Mr. Higham, in acknowledging the welcome, described how he came to leave the Church of England, and said that after holding an unsectarian appointment for five or six years under the Birmingham Corporation among the workpeople at their waterworks in Wales, he had now decided to continue his labours amongst Unitarians.

THE NEW CENTURY MEETINGS.

THE hopes with which the meetings of this week were planned have been more than realised. Writing in the midst of the week, during the first session of the International Council, it is impossible to say more than a few words, but there is a sense of happy achievement, and the promise of great good which must grow out of such gatherings.

Both the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and the Sunday-school Association are to be congratulated on the spirit which lifted their annual meetings far above the level of mere routine business and left an impression of strength, of courage, and of a forward look, auguring well for the work of the new century; while no one could be present at the crowded meeting on Thursday morning, when the first session of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers was held, and the delegates from other countries were welcomed, without feeling how rich in blessing, in mutual understanding and the deepening of spiritual sympathies, are the opportunities which the Council brings to us.

We have heard words of inspiration, such as we looked for in Mr. STOPFORD BROOKE'S sermon, and were not disappointed; such as we found also in the address by Dr. CROTHERS on Thursday morning, on "The Sympathy of Religions." We will not attempt here any description of its argument, for we hope next week to publish it in full; but it is not often that we experience so keen a spiritual delight as we found in listening to his words, and we count this first meeting of the International Council happy indeed to have brought us such a visitant.

Our readers will see that we have not this year followed the custom of previous years in Whit-week, but have kept to an ordinary issue of our paper, holding the promise of many good things to come; in this way, apart from other reasons, we hope to ensure more attention to a series of remarkable and helpful utterances, and will add here only one word of the warmest gratitude for what this week has brought us.

CHRONICLE OF THE WEEK.

THE week of meetings to be briefly chronicled here began on Saturday, May 25. It will be a week of eight days, high days of festival for many members of our Unitarian Societies and their friends and for members of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers. The Chronicle must be completed next week, and even when the eight days are done, the golden week will be loath to come to an end and there may be more days to add, and echoes of meetings to continue for some time to come.

The week began with sunshine, and although we heard of storms in the North, our first rain in London came on Wednesday night, after the soirée, most welcome to the thirsty earth, to be followed by another fine morning for the first day of the International Council meetings. The first day was simply for arrivals, and pleasant greetings at Essex Hall. On that afternoon a goodly number of guests had already entered their names in the book which recorded the arrivals (not far from 200), including the Rev. C. W. Wendté, Secretary of the International Council, and two or three happy parsons who, without crossing the Atlantic, had secured a Sunday's rest.

A campaign of afternoon teas—most merciful of institutions—was agreeably opened, the thick of the fight coming later in the week, but always welcome.

The Excursions Bureau, in Mr. Ion Pritchard's charge, was kept busily at work, and here it may be said once for all that this section of the week's festival has been most successfully carried out. There were, of course, some disappointments, but we have reason to believe that the various excursions and visits to places of interest were greatly enjoyed by a large number of our guests and those who undertook the conduct of the parties, so much so that several were repeated, and more than one party was considerably enlarged from the numbers originally planned. This was especially the case with the Richmond excursion, which included a visit to Pembroke Lodge. It happened that Tuesday, the day chosen for this visit, was the anniversary of Earl Russell's death, and Lady Agatha Russell said that no small part of her pleasure in receiving her guests consisted in the thought of the pleasure it would have been to her father to receive such a party in his much-loved home.

On Saturday the first of the foreign visitors of the International Council also arrived—Professor Montet of Geneva, the Rev. Tony André of Florence, Professor Eerdmans of Leiden, and the Rev. N. Jozan of Budapest; also the visitors who had had the longest journey, but are no foreigners, Mr. Wendté and Dr. and Mrs. Crothers from New England. The greater number of the International guests were entertained at the St. Ermin's Hotel, Westminster, where the Rev. J. Harwood, Chairman of the Hospitality Committee, acted as host. If the languages were mixed, it was for the better understanding of the delightful harmony of International friendship, and the interests and sympathies of such intercourse which deepened as the week advanced.

SUNDAY, MARCH 26.

Saturday was only the prelude; on Whit-Sunday came the services, which were the first actual gatherings of the New Century meetings.

At the morning service in Little Portland-street Chapel, the Rev. C. W. Wendté preached from the text "With thee is the fountain of life, in thy light shall we see light"—a sermon on the "Universality, Power and Permanence of Religious Inspiration," laying a fit foundation for the thoughts of the whole week. At Richmond Dr. Crothers preached in the morning, and the Rev. N. Jozan at night. Dr. Eerdmans preached at the Dutch Church in Austin Friars, while Dr. Montet and Mr. André visited the Swiss Church in Endell-street, where the minister is an old pupil of the former at Geneva. Mr. André is also a pupil of Dr. Montet's, and they two at the conclusion of the service administered the Communion to the congregation.

On Sunday afternoon was the annual gathering of the elder scholars and teachers of the London Sunday-schools in Essex Hall. Fourteen schools were represented, and over 200 scholars besides a large number of visitors were present. The hymns were sung, and the service was conducted by the Rev. J. Page Hopps, of whose address on "The King's Son in Egypt" an account will be found in this week's "Children's Column."

Then in the evening came the special service for Teachers and Church Workers, at Little Portland-street Chapel, when the Rev. A. N. Blatchford was the preacher. The renovated chapel looks specially bright in its new and cheerful decoration when lighted up at night, and the body was filled with a large and earnest congregation. The first part of the service was conducted by the Rev. H. S. Perris, minister of the chapel, and the spirit of the gathering was at once felt in the singing of the hymns. It is only workers, whose heart is in their work, who have gathered for sincere worship, seeking a fresh consecration, who sing as they sang that night. The first hymn was

> Now thank we all our God
> With heart and hands and voices.

And specially delightful was the singing of T. H. Gill's hymn, "We came unto our father's God," with the verse,

> Their joy unto their Lord we bring;
> Their song to us descendeth;
> The Spirit who in them did sing
> To us his music lendeth.
> His song in them, in us, is one;
> We raise it high, we send it on,
> The song that never endeth.

And last of all came the hymn from Milton, as arranged by Dr. Martineau, "The Lord will come, and not be slow."

Mr. Blatchford took for text the verse from Numbers xiii. 30, "And Caleb stilled the people before Moses, and said, Let us go up at once and possess it (the promised land) for we are well able to overcome," and drew a vivid picture of the two determined men amid the hesitating, nerveless people who shrank from the dangers they had to face, and longed to be back in Egypt. To Caleb and Joshua the forward path of duty and sacrifice was the one that could and therefore must be tried. Through the courage and devotion of a true man, a great calm fell upon the panic-stricken crowd. Out of his dauntless spirit came the triumph of the people and the preservation of their faith. That was the ideal which the preacher held up before the workers and teachers to whom he spoke. He recalled the memory of many devoted predecessors, and from such a lesson gathered an impulse of hope and determination for the glorious work to which they were called, into the promised land of child-life into which they were to enter.

MONDAY, MAY 27.

Whit-Monday was devoted chiefly to its great holiday purpose, and a glorious day of summer warmth and light it was. From all parts of the country our people came up to their great gathering, until for the evening meeting of the friends of Temperance at Essex Hall, the pleasure and encouragement of a record attendance was provided.

THE ESSEX HALL TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION (RE-CHRISTENED).

The meeting of this Association was divided into two parts, first coming the regular business, with a number of extremely interesting and helpful speeches, and at the end a resolution, of which notice had been given in the Committee's Report, and which as amended was passed by an overwhelming majority, declaring that in future the Association shall be known as "The National Unitarian Temperance Association." Of this meeting we must reserve our report for a later issue.

TUESDAY, MAY 28.

The Sunday-school Breakfast on Tuesday morning was the revival of an ancient glory, which surpassed in brightness all the breakfasts of which we have any remembrance. True, the meeting was not at half-past seven, as on the occasion of the foundation of the Institution; but at nine o'clock the King's Hall, adjoining the Holborn Restaurant, which was the happy scene of the London Unitarian Bazaar, was filled with a company of about 400, who enjoyed the morning hour as only those who attend a Sunday-school breakfast can enjoy, and then the annual meeting of the Association followed, at which many more besides the breakfasters were present. The meeting opening with the singing of Mr. Tarrant's "Labourers' Hymn," which is in this year's Helper, the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, the President, being in the chair. We cannot attempt a report of the meeting this week, and will only mention here that the publication of two new books on that day was announced, one of them being Mr. Bowie's "Code-book," which will be found of great interest and use to teachers. Of the Committee's report we published an abstract last week, and hope soon to publish a full report of the admirable addresses delivered at the meeting. During the meeting a telegram of greeting was sent to that old friend of Sunday-schools, the veteran of the Association, Mr. I. M. Wade, of Norwich, who sent a response saying he had been with them "all along in thought and heart."

Before leaving the King's Hall we must record a pleasant and innocent piece of gossip, which we met floating about in that region. It is said that when the representatives of the Association went to the Hall to arrange for the meeting they were met with a cordiality they did not at first understand; but then they found that the Unitarian Bazaar had made a great impression on the attendants connected with the Hall. Why, it was said, these Unitarians, in all their week's business, were never seen to quarrel, and the constable at the door had not once to be called in to quiet any disturbance, a thing unprecedented in his experience of such charitable and religious carnivals! So the S.S.A. reaped the benefit of the big bazaar's reputation for good humour! Such was the gossip; and knowing Unitarians as we do, we have not the least doubt of its accurate truth.

Tuesday afternoon brought the annual meeting of the Central Postal Mission at Essex Hall, to be reported later, and the excursions, including that to Richmond, of which we have already spoken. Later there was a meeting in connection with the scheme of the National Conference Committee for the Superannuation of Unitarian Ministers, as to which an important resolution, moved by Sir John Brunner, and supported by Mr. William Colfox, Mr. William Long, and others, was passed. Of this more will shortly be heard.

In the evening a well-attended Communion service was held in Little Portland-street Chapel, conducted by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, assisted by the Revs. Dr. Brooke Herford, W. Napier, R. J. Jones, H. S. Solly, T. P. Spedding, J. E. Stronge, and H. S. Perris. Dr. Herford gave out the last hymn and pronounced the Benediction.

This was followed at eight o'clock by the annual service of the B. and F.U.A. in St. James's Hall, which was filled with a congregation of at least 2,000 people. The singing of the hymns was glorious, first "O worship the King," then Watts's "O God, our help in ages past," of which a writer in the Daily News said that he had never heard it so sung. Before the sermon came Frothingham's one great hymn, "Thou Lord of Hosts, whose guiding hand," and at the end, "Pour, blessed Gospel, glorious news to man."

The large choir, gathered from all parts of the country, also rendered the anthem, "Thine, O Lord, is the greatness," beautifully, Mr. John Harrison being the honorary organist. The service was conducted by the Rev. V. D. Davis, and the annual sermon, full of inspiration (printed in full in our present issue), was preached by the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke.

The collection in the Hall amounted to about £80, and has since, we believe, been augmented. It would have been more in the hall but for a curious occurrence, in consequence of which we add this piece of advice to the innocent. If you have to leave before the collection is taken, and a respectable individual standing by the door, in the stress of the moment having no collection plate within reach, holds out his two hands, in the form of an ecclesiastical receptacle, even if he has a pious face do not fill his hands with money; because afterwards he goes his own way, and the money goes too, but not the way of the righteous!

WEDNESDAY, MAY 29.

The annual meeting of the B. and F.U.A., which was preceded by a devotional service conducted by the Rev. E. W. Lummis, of Warrington, is reported in another column.

Mid-day on Wednesday the representatives of District Associations, Societies and Unions, together with the members of the B. and F.U.A. Committee were entertained by the President at a luncheon at the Holborn Restaurant, after which an informal conference on methods of mission work took place.

In the evening the annual conversazione took place at the Royal Institute of Painters in Water Colours, Piccadilly, the guests being received by Sir John Brunner, the President. There was a very large attendance, and in spite of the great heat, a very enjoyable evening was spent.

THURSDAY, MAY 30.

THE INTERNATIONAL COUNCIL OF UNITARIAN AND OTHER LIBERAL RELIGIOUS THINKERS AND WORKERS.

Thursday morning brought us to the first Session of the International Council. The large hall was crowded to the doors, and the flags of the nations were appropriately draped along the front of the gallery. As to the origin and purpose of this Council, an interesting account will be found in the report of the General Secretary, the Rev. C. W. Wendté, printed in another column, while the inward spirit which gives it life, found noble expression in the opening address of the President, the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, also printed in full in our present issue.

The half-hour before the opening of the Council was spent in a devotional service, conducted by the Rev. F. K. Freeston, which began very appropriately with Samuel Longfellow's hymn,

> One holy church of God appears,
> Through every age and race,
> Unwasted by the lapse of years,
> Unchanged by changing place.

After which the leading members of the Council present took their places on the platform.

Among those who surrounded the President and Secretary were Miss Westenholz (of Copenhagen), Professors Bonet-Maury and Jean Réville and the Rev. Ernest Fontanes (of Paris), the Rev. J. Hocart (of Brussels), Professor Eerdmans and the Revs. P. H. Hugenholtz and F. C. Fleischer (of Holland), Dr. C. Schieler (of Königsberg (Germany), Dr. E. Montet (of Geneva), Signor Bracciforti (of Milan), and the Rev. Tony André (of Florence, Italy), and the Rev. N. Jozan (Budapest), Dr. Stefansson (of Iceland), Mr. Ghosh (of Calcutta), and Mr. Vladimir Tchertkoff (a Russian exile and Tolstoy's friend). It was hoped that Mr. Woodhead (of Capetown) and Mr. Alexander (of Melbourne) would be also present. It was announced that on Saturday morning, at ten o'clock, a business meeting of the Council would be held, at which the presence of all friends interested in the movement was invited.

Welcome to Delegates from other Countries.

After the President had delivered his address, which was very warmly received, the Rev. James Harwood, as Chairman of the Hospitality Committee, introduced the delegates present from other countries, and they were in turn welcomed by the President, and a representative of each country made reply.

Mr. Harwood's introductions were made in the happiest spirit, with genial and appropriate references to each country and their distinguished representatives. Speaking first of France, he pointed to the portrait of Dr. Martineau over the platform, reminding the company of what England had received from France in her Huguenots. Professor Bonet-Maury, replying for MM. Réville and Fontanes and himself, spoke of England as for three and a-half centuries the refuge of the persecuted Protestants of the Continent, the land where freedom of conscience was most completely to be found, so that the imperial City of London was the best place for the first meeting of that Council. He recognised the common aim of pure religion and perfect liberty in which they were all united.

Dr. Schieler spoke of the conditions of liberal religious thought in Germany, and said that it must not be supposed that because he was the one representative from Germany their liberal thinkers were few in number. Very many theologians were entirely with them in thought and had the warmest good wishes for the Council, but did not dare to confess it publicly for fear of trouble at home. But when the invitation came to his Free Congregation at Königsberg, they felt at once that they must be represented at the meeting, since their avowed position was identical with that of the Council. Dr. Schieler spoke in German, with some English phrases interpolated, and apologised for so doing, but justified himself by the reminder that they were met in an International Council, and that it was the season of Pentecost. He promised, however, that his paper on the following day should be in English.

The Rev. James Hocart, of Brussels, was next greeted as an old friend, and then the representatives from Holland for whom the Rev. P. H. Hugenholz, of Amsterdam, replied. He brought, he said, the best wishes of fellow-workers in Holland, and especially the greetings of the Protestantenbond. He spoke of Holland as the cradle of liberty of religion and conscience, which had been the refuge of many heretics from other countries. The Protestantenbond, like the kindred Protestantenverein of Germany, aimed at promoting the free growth of religious life both within and without the Church. With its 9,000 members the Association was a power in the country which the orthodox could no longer ignore. Both that Society and his own Free Religious Congregation set the highest value on free and practical piety, and offered the best wishes to the International Council.

Next came Dr. Stefansson from Iceland, bringing greetings from the poet Matthias Jochumsson, who would most gladly have been present had it been possible, and sent a message of sympathy and brotherly regard. In Iceland he thought there was great scope for the spread of Unitarian thought.

Miss Westenholz, of Copenhagen, greeted as the representative of the new liberal religious movement in Denmark, spoke with a beautiful simplicity and grace in response. She represented, she said, their youngest brother, the little Danish Unitarian Congregation which had only recently accomplished the first year of its existence, and she remembered that the little children should be seen and not heard. The longing for sympathy had tempted her to tell the history of their little community to the Council, but she refrained, and only offered the loving greetings of their little congregation, and thanks for the sympathy and help they had received. She asked that they might be received to march on with the greater body, to a higher knowledge of truth and a purer, stronger faith.

The Rev. N. Jozan brought a greeting, signed by John Kovacs, from Torda, the town where in 1557 freedom of conscience was first proclaimed, where the Unitarian religion was legally recognised, and where in 1868 the late John James Tayler was present at their Tercentenary celebrations. He himself, Mr. Jozan said, came from the same town around which the memories of his childhood and of the hopes and struggles of manhood were gathered. He delivered the warm greetings of their Right Rev. Bishop Ferencz, of his own church at Budapest and of their other churches in Hungary. In their hopes and aspirations they were one with the Council.

Dr. Montet, of Geneva, speaking in French, then acknowledged the warm reception he had received as representing the liberal Protestant churches of Switzerland, and expressed his gratitude for the helpfulness of their magnificent and cordial gathering, and the service the Council would render in deepening the spiritual communion which drew them together.

Signor Bracciforti, in a fervent speech, spoke for Italy, declaring his faith in the progress and unity of his country, grounded on his faith in God.

At this point the President told how he had heard from Signor Bracciforti a touching account of the veneration of the Queen of Italy for the writings of Channing and Martineau, which he had been able to introduce to her notice, and how, in the time of her terrible trial last year, when the King was murdered, the faith she had learnt from them found expression in a prayer which the Church indeed condemned, but which the people had taken to their hearts—a prayer which poured out the confidence of her soul in the Father, and asked forgiveness for the murderer.

Mr. Vladimir Tchertkoff was the next to be greeted, and his mention of Tolstoy's name was met by a storm of long-continued applause. It was a happiness to him, he said, to find that his friend's teaching met with such warm response in this country. He himself, and Tolstoy, also, belonged to no religious community, but they were in close sympathy with Unitarian teaching. He himself had found it very helpful, and he believed it would be of great service in Russia. He was therefore taking steps to translate some Unitarian literature into his own language.

India was to have been represented by Dr. J. C. Bose, but he unfortunately was prevented by illness from being present, and his place was admirably taken by Mr. Ghosh, of Calcutta, who spoke of Mr. Mozoomdar as his godfather, and referred to the teaching of the Brahmo Somaj and the "New Dispensation" of Keshub Chunder Sen as foreshadowing the ideal of that Council.

The last to be greeted, but not as foreigners, were our brethren from America, for whom Dr. Crothers spoke, with inimitable charm, delivering the greetings of the President and members of the American Unitarian Association, and the Unitarian Churches of that country.

At the conclusion of these delightful greetings the crowded meeting paused for a moment, to be still more densely packed, and then at noon Dr. Crothers gave an address on "The Sympathy of Religions," followed by Mr. Graham Wallas on "Religion and Empire"; and at this point the Chronicle must be suspended until next week. The public meeting of Thursday evening we hope then fully to report, and to print also Dr. Crothers' address in full, and possibly some other of the papers, as well as telling the rest of the story of the week.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE annual business meeting was held at Essex Hall on Wednesday morning, preceded by a devotional service conducted by the Rev. E. W. Lummis, M.A.

The chair was taken at ten o'clock by the President, Sir J. T. BRUNNER, Bart., M.P., and there was a large attendance of members and friends.

The report of the Committee, of which we published an abstract last week, was presented by the Secretary, the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie.

Mr. OSWALD NETTLEFOLD, in presenting the Treasurer's accounts, pointed to a decrease in the subscription list, and noted that the Association had now £50 less to pay in rent, as Essex Hall had become so much more popular as a place for public meetings. The McQuaker Trust had selected a Scotch student, to whom a bursary was paid, that he might attend Manchester College, Oxford, with a view to ministry in Scotland; that was a new departure in the administration of the trust. With regard to the Indian Fund, Mr. Fletcher Williams was on his way home, and there would be no immediate call for any further great expenditure, but when the hour had come and the man had been found who might be sent on a further mission to India, he was confident that the additional funds which would be required would be forthcoming. They were sometimes told their work was done, and certainly great changes had been effected in the doctrinal teaching of the churches; but their greatest work had still to be done, and it would have to be on the lines of Mr. Stopford Brooke's sermon on the previous evening. He quoted the saying of S. A. Eliot's, printed on a page of the report, as to Unitarianism: "It is the movement away from dogmatic Christianity towards spiritual Christianity." That must be their aim, and he urged them especially to enlist their young people in support of the work of the Association.

The PRESIDENT then moved the adoption of the report. He congratulated the members on the very pleasant conditions under which the meetings were held, and referring to the report noted with satisfaction that the Unitarian movement in Japan had now been taken entirely into the hands of native workers. He referred to Mr. Stopford Brooke's brilliant sermon, and said that if the Association had done nothing more than secure the services of such a preacher for the country, and such lectures as those of Mr. Carpenter, which he recognised as the best kind of University extension lectures, it would be justified. He would gladly appeal to friends outside to declare their agreement with members in matters of religion. He constantly met men in public life, who told him in private that they were practically Unitarians, but who hesitated to declare themselves. Their fellow-countrymen in the last two years had exhibited in the field of battle a courage that had been the admiration of the world. He wished they would show the same courage in the moral and spiritual world. If they could show that higher courage, he should feel satisfied that public questions would be dealt with in a far higher spirit than at present. For if a man would only display the courage required in declaring himself a Liberal Christian, he would obtain the necessary courage to deal with public affairs. He has recently been asked to join in a memorial signed by distinguished men, among whom were two bishops and a dean, aiming to deal with the condition of the streets, which was a shame not only to their Christianity but to their humanity. He had been unable to sign, because he hated the system which harried the victims and left the tempter alone. He should consider himself a coward if he signed that petition. In conclusion, he said he was giving up that day the office of President, which he had not felt as a burden, but as an honour. He had given to it his widow's mite of time, all that he could give. He felt it an honour to be placed in that position by the people whom of all others he respected most highly, and it was a pleasure to him to think that he was to be succeeded by so admirable a President as Dr. Blake Odgers. He offered his sincere and hearty good wishes for the success of the Association.

The Rev. J. C. STREET, in seconding the resolution, said it was forty-two years since he had first attended a meeting of that Association, and, except for necessary absences when he had been out of the country, he had attended regularly ever since, and had heard or read all the reports. He had seen and honoured the succession of men who had charge of its affairs, and now could form some judgment of what the Association had represented and striven to do and of its present position. During those forty-two years more than 100 new churches had been established in the United Kingdom representing their principles; that did not look like stagnation or going backward, it meant life and progress. Not all those churches were founded by the Association, though many were, but all had received generous and consistent support. They had had many contests with strong convictions on both sides; but now, while convictions were as strong as ever, they had been brought nearer and nearer together, more conscious of the supreme essence of that in which they were all concerned, with mutual understanding, seeing the same motive and purpose in all and desiring the same end. In the formation and support of churches the Association had sailed with an even keel. Formerly it might have seemed that it would identify itself with one form of thought, but of recent years it had known nothing of parties, but its resources had been administered and its help given to churches and people without distinction of school of thought, giving them the happy condition they at present enjoyed. The Association, as the report stated, neither desired nor had the right to claim ecclesiastical authority or controlling functions over individuals or churches. In former years many had wished to make the Association representative of the churches, but happily that controversy was over, and now they had an organisation representative of the churches, while that was an Association of individuals banded together for the proclamation of great principles. There did not seem to be any necessary connection between their name as Unitarians and their name as members of the great Universal Church of God. But no word had broadened so much as the word Unitarian. They read into it more and more breadth and catholicity, brotherhood, and unity. It was no longer a mere flag of defiance, but of leadership and progress, representing men and women striving to be in the van of progress of the Church of God. Their Association had been wonderfully conducted and directed. He recalled the earnest leadership and catholicity of successive presidents and secretaries of the Association, of whom the first he remembered was Robert Brook Aspland. Of him, of Robert Spears and Henry Ierson he spoke with warm appreciation of their several gifts, and finally of Mr. Bowie, the present secretary, to whose genial presence, patience, earnest and enthusiastic work, not in London alone, but throughout the country, the Association owed so much. The present happy condition of their church life was largely due to his work and influence. He was happy to be there to second the report, which was unanimously adopted.

Mr. WILLIAM LONG moved, and Mr. GROSVENOR TALBOT seconded, a resolution of thanks to the officers and Committee and the appointments for the ensuing year, with Dr. Blake Odgers as president. Both speakers joined in the warm praises of the officers, and augured well for the Association during the new President's term of office.

The PRESIDENT then moved:—

That the hearty welcome of this meeting be given to the representatives of affiliated and kindred Associations and Societies, with an expression of its sympathy with the good work which they are severally doing for the maintenance and extension of the principles of Unitarian Christianity:—East Cheshire Union, Rev. B. C. Constable; Eastern Union, Rev. Alfred Hall, M.A.; Irish Non-Subscribing Association, Rev. James Kennedy; Liverpool District Association, Mr. B. P. Burroughs; London District Society, Mr. G. H. Clennell; London and S.E.C. Provincial Assembly, Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A.; Manchester District Association, Rev. Charles Roper, B.A.; Midland Christian Union, Rev. A. A. Charlesworth; North-Midland Association, Rev. Henry Gow, B.A.; Northumberland and Durham Association, Mr. J. Baxter Ellis, J.P.; Scottish Unitarian Churches, Mr. James Graham; South Wales Association, Mr. Lewis N. Williams; South East Wales Society, Rev. D. J. Williams; Southern Unitarian Association, Mr. J. Cogan Conway; Western Union, Rev. A. N. Blatchford, B.A.; Yorkshire Unitarian Union, Mr. E. B. Lupton, LL.M.

Dr. BLAKE ODGERS, in seconding, acknowledged the honour of his election as President, and spoke of the great value of the work done by the District Associations, to whom their Central Committee always applied in the first instance when any question arose in connection with the churches they were called upon to assist.

The resolution was acknowledged by four representatives—from Ireland, Scotland, Wales, and England, respectively.

The Rev. J. KENNEDY, of Larne, spoke for Ireland, referring to the history of their Non-subscribing Associations, and strongly urging the necessity of holding to distinctively Christian teaching as declared in Mr. Stopford Brooke's sermon.

Mr. JAMES GRAHAM, of Glasgow, spoke for Scotland, telling of the great encouragement they, in their isolated efforts, found in coming into the midst of such large gatherings where they found their own principles so largely held and powerfully stated. Such witnesses made them realise that their principles were grounded in the spirit of truth.

Mr. LEWIS WILLIAMS, of Aberdare, spoke for Wales, and referred to the new energy and hope which had of recent years been brought into the life of their Welsh Unitarian churches, notably by their united musical festivals.

The Rev. C. ROPER, of Manchester, spoke for England, and urged the need of greater courage in those who held liberal views of religion when they had converted the minds of people, there was often need to put some moral back-bone into them. A Unitarian worthy of the name was the truest Christian in the world, thoroughly unselfish, feeling that as he had a good thing he must share it with others, and if he could not do practical missionary work himself, then giving liberally in its support.

The Rev. A. N. BLATCHFORD moved a resolution of gratitude for the progress of civil and religious liberty in the past and of renewed consecration for the new century. He pointed to the progress marked by the presence of Manchester College at Oxford, of Essays and Reviews, and the courage of Colenso in the old days, and of the Revised Version of the Bible which made so strongly for the Unitarian position. They could not insist too strongly on the fact that they were pledged to progress. There could be no self-assertion and no dogmatism in their Association. Doctrine they had, but what doctrine? That of Aspland and Madge, that of Martineau and John James Tayler, and of Channing, and the principles of Theodore Parker with his passionate love of the man Christ Jesus. His name connected together the principles of civil and religious liberty. Theirs could be no narrow doctrinal association; it was pledged to those great principles.

Mr. CHARLES W. JONES seconded the resolution, and pointed out how long they had been familiar with the teaching now found in such a work as the "Encyclopædia Biblica." When people asked whether the work of Unitarianism was not done, he replied, yes, it was done, and very well done; but it was not half finished. As to the future and its consecration, of which the resolution spoke, they must simply go on doing patiently and steadily what they had been doing, and then the time would come when the whole lump would be leavened, and the happy consummation would be achieved, when the essence of religion would be felt to be not correctness of views but sincerity.

The PRESIDENT then moved the following resolution on the Education Question:—

This meeting is opposed to the expenditure of public money upon schools which are under private or sectarian management, and declares that no amendment or reconstruction of the Education Acts can be just or satisfactory which fails to provide for an effective elective control in the management of schools and in the appointment of teachers; and provision should be made for securing that no disability shall be imposed upon teachers or scholars, managers or parents, on account of their religious beliefs in any school supported by rates or taxes.

This meeting deplores the attempts to cripple the Higher Grade Schools, and in other ways to check the natural expansion of education, and affirms that the maintenance and extension of such schools are imperatively necessary for the industrial and commercial interests of the country, and for the development of the intelligence and character of the people.

This meeting is further of opinion that the present system of Denominational Training Colleges is injurious to education and unjust to teachers, and that the time has arrived when powers should be given to Educational Authorities, singly or in combination, to establish training colleges under public management; and free from all ecclesiastical or theological tests.

His views on education, the President said, were well known, and he should not enlarge on the subject of the resolution. They all, who were outside the Church of England, had the right to claim a share in the management of schools carried on by means of national money. So they claimed efficient popular control of all elementary schools, the right to share in the appointment of teachers by means of public representation on the management of each individual school. When that change was made, the children would receive greater justice and kindness. Irresponsible power was good for no one. If they took away such power from the clergy in the 8,000 parishes where there was only one school, they might be sure it would be no injury to them, and a great benefit to the people of the villages.

Lady O'HAGAN seconded the resolution, and insisted very earnestly on the importance of agitating throughout the country on the subject of the Bill before Parliament, an undefined skeleton of a Bill, which, if public opinion was not roused to the importance of the issue, would be passed in such a form as to do great injury to the best interests of the country as a whole. With great regret she found that not only Conservatives, but many Liberals, failed to realise the greatness of the issues at stake, and were inclined to let the matter pass from mere apathy. When she had recently gone to the Duke of Devonshire and Sir John Gorst with the deputation of the Associated School Boards and other public bodies, Sir John Gorst had made a very specious, high-sounding plea. The deputation complained that the action of the Bill would be to take away technical education and the advancement of the primary schools, to the injury of the working people; but Sir John Gorst replied that he never advocated schools for the people, people's schools; all schools, were alike, and they did not want to make any difference; which would be a magnificent sentiment when he had given equality of opportunity to all. As to training colleges, there was no provision in the Bill to secure liberty of conscience to teachers; the colleges might be absolutely denominational. On these and other points it was necessary to insist, and the people must not be allowed to go to sleep on the subject.

A resolution of thanks to the President, to Mr. Brooke for his sermon, to the congregation of Little Portland-street and many friends in London for their hospitality, moved by the Rev. J. E. MANNING, and seconded by Mr. FRANKLIN WINSER, brought the meeting to a close.

OH joy supreme! I know the Voice,
Like none beside on earth or sea;
Yea, more, oh soul of mine, rejoice,
By all that He requires of me
I know what God Himself must be.— Whittier.

DR. BROOKE HERFORD.

AMONG the portraits, whose quiet presence on the wall above the platform at Essex Hall reminded us during this week's meetings of friends and teachers, of those already past away, but still the inspiration of our best life, and others happily still with us, very many must have looked with keenest sympathy and affectionate regret on the face of Dr. Brooke Herford, so long a familiar presence, full of hearty stimulus and happy sunshine, at the gatherings of our people. The regret was keen because we know so well how he would have delighted to be with us. The sympathy was heartfelt, from the thought of his recent sorrow, and the fact that the condition of his own health rendered it impossible to take his wonted part in what was going on.

Dr. Herford was present and took part in the Communion service at Little Portland-street Chapel on Tuesday evening, giving out the last hymn, and pronouncing the Benediction, but from the greater and more crowded meetings he was obliged to abstain.

It will be already known to many of our readers that Dr. Herford has resigned the pulpit of Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead, and now in the year of jubilee of his service as a minister of religion retires from active duty. Many friends in England and America, not only those connected with his old congregations at Todmorden, Sheffield, Manchester, and Hampstead, and Chicago and Boston in America, but many others throughout the whole range of the two religious communities with which he has been so long and so closely associated, follow him into his retirement with thoughts of gratitude and warm affection and heartfelt good wishes, and the natural desire to mark this feeling in some tangible way is finding practical expression.

A Committee has been formed, of which Sir John Brunner is the chairman and Mr. Macrae Moir (52, New Broad-street, London, E.C.), the secretary, with the intention of offering to Dr. Herford some mark of the warm appreciation of his life-long services which so widely prevails. Friends who have not heard further particulars, and who desire to have a share in this, should communicate with the Hon. Secretary at the above address.

WHEN the body is weakened by pain, the thoughts are confused and the spirits sunk, we are apt to think it is no time to aim at perfection, and that we are incapable of making any effort towards it; yet, even here, we should remember that the perfection required of us consists in exerting to the utmost those powers which we possess, however small they may be. In such a state we cannot, indeed, act as we would have done in the days of health and strength, but we can still constantly and sincerely endeavour to do our best. —Jane Bowdler.

GOD hides some ideal in every human soul. At some time in our life we feel a trembling, fearful longing to do some good thing. Life finds its noblest spring of excellence in this hidden impulse to do our best.—Robert Collyer.

THE KINGDOM OF GOD WITHIN.

BY THE REV. STOPFORD A. BROOKE, M.A., LL.D.*

"The Kingdom of God is within you."—Luke xvii. 21.

NEARLY forty-five years have passed away since I was first permitted to speak in London of the Gospel of Jesus Christ; and when I look back to 1857, and think of the progress made since then in Liberal Theology, I am full of astonishment at the swiftness of the progress, and of thankfulness to God that, in the swiftness, we who are met here to-night, and those who in the churches and other Nonconformist bodies than our own have fought in the same cause, have been so led by the great Guide that neither by reaction, nor by over-excitement into extremes, have we lost the deep-holding anchors of the Faith delivered to us by our Master Jesus.

Many new religions and philosophies, the common property of which is the exclusion of the spiritual world in which a divine Father comes into the direct contact of love with man, His child, have been offered to our acceptance. We have taken what was good in them and true; we have not abused or decried them, but we have clung fast to that which they ignored or denied, and claimed for it supremacy. We have kept the Faith through a long and arduous battle. The little stream of Liberal Theology which had risen, almost unnoticed, about 1832, high on the mountain-side, and had made its way over rocks and shallows, and among storms, with a joyous life in its increasing waters, had in the years between 1850 and 1870 reached the most rugged and difficult part of its descent. It had to make its way and keep its faith against the steady attacks of the Evangelical and High Church parties; who, themselves opposed to one another, united against its progress. It had to accept the proved truths of science and historical criticism, and yet not surrender, as the devotees of science and criticism too often did, the root ideas of the Christian Faith. It was not unfaithful, at any point, to physical, intellectual, or moral truth, But it maintained, beyond all the conclusions of science, criticism, or ethics, that there was a spiritual world, in which God and man met together as Father and child, and whose truths were more vital to the welfare of humanity than anything else in the universe. Thus, while accepting the lower truths, it maintained the higher. This is the battle it fought, and the stream, to which I have likened it, had for many years a broken, tormented, and contending life. Those days are all but passed away. Its waters have now emerged from the foot-hills, and we stand beside them in comparative peace. The turbulent stream has become a full-fed and quiet river, running swiftly, it is true, and now and then disturbed, but destined to greater peace, and widening into deeper channels day by day, fit before long to have the cities of a nobler religion than England has yet known built upon its banks; and desiring to meet with a joyous welcome, in the ocean of God's love into which it will finally flow, its brother rivers from all lands.

Its former enemies come now to drink of its waters. Science and criticism have begun to feel the extremes into which they have driven their opposition to the spiritual, and are drawing near to a religion which does not deny what is proved to be true by them, but which asserts truths beyond the spheres of their activity. They feel necessities of the soul which their special work does not touch or satisfy.

The orthodox have not only modified their opposition, they have yielded at many points. The evangelical has become as liberal as the man he attacked with virulence in 1860. The High Churchman has published books on Inspiration which would have earned him from his brethren a summons before the Courts of Law forty years ago. What ancient history, what a dream, it must seem to the orthodox Nonconformist and Churchman, when they think of the prosecution set on foot, after the "Essays and Reviews," against the assumed denial of Eternal Punishment! What a vast difference there is everywhere, save in a few fossil remnants of the past, between the moral idea of God's nature and His love, in 1860 and that held in the first year of this century! In that, more than in all else, Christianity has approached more nearly to the Gospel of Christ. Yes, religious men have all drawn together; but they have drawn together towards Liberal Theology, not away from it. We welcome the approach of our opponents, and long for a closer union with them in a simpler Faith. And for ourselves, that is, for all Liberal Theologians, in whatever Church or sect or nation we may be, whatever be our differences of opinion, we look forward to a closer union than we have yet attained. It shall be ours, if only we hold fast to the few spiritual truths which assume as their father-truth that God is, and that He loves all men and women with the love, omnipotent for their salvation, which He revealed and embodied in Jesus Christ. That is the binding, uniting power.

There are many who still limit this love, make it conditional on confession of doctrine or observance of ritual—but we proclaim it without limit and without conditions. It is no less infinite and unconditioned than God Himself. And, year by year, the churches and sects are coming swiftlier—though the movement, through its vastness, seems slow to us—into that one Doctrine, that spaceless and timeless ocean, into which all religions will finally flow with joy, and find peace, at last, peace from their foolish wars with one another, peace from their own fruitless restlessness—"Until we all come into the unity of the faith and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto the perfect man, to the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ."

It is for that we wait and pray, in quiet faith and steadfastness, knowing whom we have believed, and that He will not fail His children. Meanwhile, at every point, we proclaim this truth: "The life of God is illimitable Love, and the life of man is only found in union with God, in union with self-forgetful Love. Whatever is not of Love is against God and against Man, and is a part of death." That is the Master Truth and Law of the spiritual universe.

All beliefs in church or sect which explicitly or implicitly contradict that are doomed to perish. All religious ritual which, explicitly or implicitly, contradicts it shall also pass away. All the future doctrines and practice of a universal religion will logically and spiritually be contained in it. And all the daily life of man, in the golden time to which, in spite of a thousand failures, men still aspire, will be ruled only by that law.

Far, far away its brightness shines. Face to face with the sin and suffering of humanity we are sometimes ready to disbelieve in Love. But the sin and suffering are the proof, and not the contradiction, of the law. That law is as universal, as firm-seated as any natural law, and its sanctions are as sure.

If we violate the laws of the physical universe, we do wrong; we suffer for it, and we make others suffer. These results do not contradict, but affirm the laws. And if we violate the Law of Love by living for ourselves rather than for others, we sin against the first principle of the spiritual universe; we suffer for it, and, worst of all, we make others suffer; and the sin and the suffering are the proof and not the contradiction of the Law of Love. There is nothing more inevitable than that man must himself suffer, and cause suffering to others, until he places his life on the side of the first Law of the spiritual universe; that is, until he lives in the Love of God and man in daily self-forgetfulness. Moreover, till we learn and obey this Law, it is absolutely right that we should suffer, and make others suffer.

O learn the Law, and do its will. Live outside yourself in Love. This is the foremost lesson of private life; the foremost need of public life; the ground of all union with God and with mankind; the uprooting of evil, the rooting of good; the source of all national and international progress; the hope, the inspiration and the goal of righteous human happiness. This is our main faith, and it was the faith of Christ. It is laid down by him in mystic words men never can forget: "Whosoever saveth his life shall lose it, and whosoever loseth his life, the same shall find it."

I The first stream of thought which flows from this main doctrine is the intimate union of God through love with the soul of every man. His connection with us is an individual connection, and is one of love. Even though God is more than personal, He becomes personal to us. He is our nearest relation—our Father, as Christ declared. To believe this, and to live by it, and in its duties, is salvation, and, now or hereafter, we shall all come to that condition. We shall all be mastered by the Love of God. But as long as we disbelieve it, and refuse the duties which the Love of God imposes, we are sure to wander into wrongdoing, to be conscious of sin, to have no home beyond this world, above all, to be for ever restless, disquieted, unsatisfied. For when we do not live in the love of God and of man, we are sure to live in love of self, and that, being the antithesis of Love, makes us, in the lonely world of the soul, out of gear with God and man, with all the universe. At last, in utter weariness and sickness, we arise to go to our Father, and then we know that He is ours, and we are His. The soul knows its Master, and in that knowledge knows itself. The kingdom of God is realised as in us. It is the consciousness of a personal union between God and us, between the Father and the child, the bond of which is self-forgetful love, and the duties of which are the duties of love. So we are not lost in the multitudinous host of spirits, a mere atom in the whirl! Distinct and clear being is ours; we are separate for ever in the mind of God from all others—in the inner life isolated with God our Father.

This is the securing of everlasting individuality, that indelible desire of mankind, which all the humanitarian philosophies never can destroy, and which they so vainly call selfish. A personality, held in God alone, held in union with Eternal Love, cannot, by the very hypothesis, be selfish. It is personal union with infinite Love, and all its outgoings must be loving.

Since that is true, it naturally secures our immortality. If a soul, bound up in this personal relation to God, were to cease to be conscious of itself and God, a part of God would perish. If there be a God, and if His relation to us be what Jesus declared it to be, immortality is no longer a perhaps, it is a certainty. It is only at times, when we have slipped aside from love, when we are glooming round our self, when we have forgotten to forget ourselves, that our faith in eternal life wavers or passes away. The moment we return into the atmosphere of love; the moment we, in the vision of God in us, are borne beyond our self, our faith in that everlasting continuance returns, and with it, joy and power. God in us, and we in God for ever—what a faith is that! What unwearied life is in it—what activity, what joy! And how, in its reality, the little trouble of our seventy years, which yet seems, when we do not love enough, so heavy, how it disappears! The pain and fret and fume of earth fades like an unsubstantial vision.

This then is the truth we have to teach—"Each soul is in God, and God is in each soul, for ever." It was the truth Christ taught. It is the root of Christianity. It was by proclaiming that, and dying for it, that Christ saved the world. By proclaiming it and dying for it, we, with him, save his brothers and our own. Men bow before its power as the summer wheat bows before the summer wind. To get men to believe it is to release them from sin, to bring them into righteousness, to heal their sorrows, to quiet their restlessness, to give them victory over death. Tell it forth among all men, unconditionally, with no limits attached to it, as Christ told it; without argument, without analysis, soul speaking to soul in the name of God—and you will sow the kingdom of God, like corn, upon the earth, and leave behind you an unhoped-for harvest. For God gives a hundred-fold increase to the sowing of this truth. The message which the Father has given to us—shall we not proclaim it?

This is the Gospel we Christians are to deliver. But it is also the thing we are to feel, to know, and to live by, in our secret soul. There is a whole world within us, the world of personality, made within during years of silent life, of which no one knows but God, the life of which is lived with Him alone.

It is a sorrowful and restless life when it is lived in opposition to Him. We try to persuade ourselves that He has nothing to do with it, but in the hours when the soul is true it knows by its restlessness that God is with it, and that He makes it restless till it confesses Him.

It is a happy and a quiet life, when the soul knows that it is at one with God, when it has yielded itself to union with its Father. Then we live in His love, and the love of pure goodness makes us grow in inward righteousness. Then, because we are leaving sin behind day by day, we know we are forgiven, that is, we know we are loved by God. Then, if temptation come, we conquer it; then, if sorrow and pain beset our hidden life, they are endured, for we know they are the source of strength and joy; then fear of death and that which is beyond death—the fear which is our deadliest curse—passes away from our lonely hours, and is succeeded by celestial joy; and with the joy is so great a sense of power that all the force by which the world seeks to tempt or to subdue our character to its wicked will is counted as contemptible. Then loving God, we love all that comes from God. All outward nature flows into us and fills us with beauty and delight. All human nature, even in its sorrows and wrong, is dear to us, for it also is held in God; and then, beyond both Nature and Human Nature, we feel at one with the whole universe of Spirits, whom we know not, but whom we believe are in the mightier worlds beyond our world, creatures who move and have their being in God; our brothers, with whom we may be, even now, invisibly concerned, and with whom we shall certainly act and live hereafter. These things fill the soul with infinite delights and hopes and loves, till that little kingdom swells into harmony with the boundless universe. This is our individual life—the hidden, solitary result of God in the soul, and the soul in God.

II. A selfish life? Yes, if that were all. But it is a life whose foundation is Love, and the first property of Love is to expend itself on all it touches. We are men, and we touch Humanity. The Love of God within us cannot rest a moment without expansion. It is impassioned to act and live for those we know now to be our brothers, since they are God's children. To help, to heal, to comfort, to exalt them; to seek and save those of them who are lost; to live for the great ideas and causes which advance and strengthen mankind; to lose our self-desires and self-thought in love of them; to forget the claims of personality in them—that is the outward result in life which follows directly and inevitably on our consciousness of being at one with God our Father in an inward personal relation of love. Love, conscious of itself in God, realises instantly that it can only continue to live in God by expending itself in action among men who are His children.

There are uncounted proofs of the truth of that in the lives of Christian men. Christ himself is its first proof. No one was ever more alone with his Father than Jesus Christ. No one, more than he, felt his separate personality with God. In God he claimed and realised his individuality. This leaps to light in half the things he said and did. Yet, this very sense of separate life in love with God drove him forth into the world of man to be there the greatest and most impassioned Collectivist than ever lived. For the love the Father felt for him and he for the Father, came, charged with the imperative message to save men, women and children from sin and sorrow. That he declared in his first sermon; that he lived throughout his ministry; that he died for. And that is our life, our work among men. Personal to God, we are to be, as it were, impersonal to man. Finding our being in inner union with absolute Love, we are to lose our selfish life by giving it up for our fellow men. Wealth, luxury, money-getting, evil force and power, injurious fame, the world that passes away and the lust thereof—all that does the slightest wrong to men, the falsehood and fraud which, at others' disadvantage, wins our advantage, whether these be personal or national—are to be counted vile, degrading and ruinous in our eyes. They are sins against Love, and in them we lose our union with God and our communion with Man. O, "what doth it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his soul? What shall a man give in exchange for his soul?" And his soul, his actual life, is in personal union with the Eternal Love, and in the incessant outpouring of the love he has gained from God into the lives of the children of God.

This is the life Christianity demands that we should live towards all mankind, and it is the life which Jesus lived among us—the life which takes all the pain and wrong of humanity into itself, and gives all it has to heal the pain and redeem the wrong; which lives for all the great truths by which man advances, and dies to confirm them against their enemies. And there is nothing in high Utilitarianism, or in modern philosophies of ethics and humanity, which is uncontained in this aspect of Christianity. It covers all our civic, social, national and domestic duties. It covers all collectivism. The cry, "One for all, and all for one," comes straight out of the life of Christ.

Only, he did not leave that cry alone. Collectivism tends to ignore the natural passion for individuality which no theory will ever eradicate from man; nor does it, when it puts God and the soul aside, supply any means for the just nourishing of a noble individuality which cannot end in selfishness. But the doctrine of Christ does. It demands collectivism in all our relations to man. But it preserves our individuality in our secret relation to God, in the lonely union of the soul to its Father. And as that union is union with absolute Love, it is impossible that selfishness should belong to it. The touch of self weakens it, the dominance of self while it lasts dissolves it. There is no other religion, save this of Christ, which satisfies man's desire for a personality which shall not be selfish; and which, through the very ground of that personality—that is, through absolute love—sends him forth to lose all selfishness in living and dying for his brothers in the Father.

Christianity is then all that humanitarian ethics demand, and more. As the result of the soul's personal union with God in love is inward righteousness in thought and feeling, the daily conquest of sin, the daily growth in goodness, so the result of the soul's union with man in love is outward righteousness, the doing of justice and love in all the relations of life, the battling for truth, for pity, for honesty, the giving of comfort, help, and joy, the keeping of all the moral law as it is expanded in self-sacrifice. Christ himself contrasted his enlargement of ethics with the outward ethics of his time. The doing of right must come from the heart, must flow from love, must be done inwardly in feeling before outwardly in practice; and all the modern enlargements of ethics have not gone beyond his enlargement. To follow his method—from within to without, from life to form—to secure righteousness and love within, and therefore inevitably, righteousness and love without—is to grasp the whole of morality.

III. But though pure morality is a necessary part of religion, it is not enough to satisfy human nature. It leaves unsatisfied, unfed, that passion in us which seeks the infinite, which desires always to exceed attainment, which aspires to perfection. It leaves the imagination cold; it has no nourishment for those thoughts which wander through eternity; it leaves love without means to excel its past, and to claim its illimitable heritage of action. It binds us down to this world alone. "Here and only here lies our duty and our effort."

It is the essential difference of Christianity that it speaks primarily to these spiritual and imaginative passions in man; to the desire for the ideal, the perfect, the infinite; to that in us which knits us closest to Him who is infinite and perfect. It speaks to love, not to law; to love which is never satisfied with what it does, not to law which is satisfied with its own obedience. It knows that love of absolute goodness always excels that which the law demands, that it fulfils in its stride the law. It holds, while it secures morality, that morality is insufficient for a high human religion. And Jesus knew that well. He began with the morality of John the Baptist, "Repent for the Kingdom of Heaven is at hand." But he soon left that formula behind; and it was succeeded by "Be ye perfect, perfect in love, even as your Father in Heaven is perfect." "When ye have done all, say that ye are unprofitable servants—we have done only what it is our duty to do." That is, he laid before us the infinite, the unattainable, the perfection of God Himself, the illimitable effort of love to express itself for ever, as the goal of the human soul, as the refreshment of the ever-climbing imagination, as the external aspiration of the spirit. This is that which separates Christianity from all other religions. It is not ethics, though it includes them. It is love of infinite goodness; always acting, but making every act the stepping-stone to a higher act; always fulfilling, but from every fulfilment seeing a new horizon. Only eternity can be its home, only in the boundlessness of love is its satisfaction. Oh, well did Jesus know the deep things of the human heart when he opened to it the regions beyond morality; when he called on our love to expand for ever; when he bade us pursue the infinity of righteousness; when he disclosed to the imagination the absolute beauty; when he said, "Your Father is perfect, be satisfied with nothing less than His perfection."

There is no finality in such a religion. It provides for endless development. Nearer and dearer, because of this ideality in it, it will become to the heart of man. We have had enough of materialisms of late, enough of the ethics which bind us only to this earth, to the visible, to a race which we are to serve while it perishes for ever; to duties done without passion and reckoned up at the close of the day! We have had enough of a world which has put aside imagination for analysis and claimed the logical understanding as the only master of life, which has denied the invisible and the eternal as objects of thought, exiled Faith from its home in the heart, and, while it asserted man, denied God. We had to go through this, but it has been a pitiable business, and the results on society have not been enchanting. But now I seem to see that things are beginning to change. Love and imagination are again awakening. Men are tending to believe in and desire the invisible, the unattainable, the spiritual. They wish for conduct, but they long for perfection. They cannot live any longer without God the Father, nor do their work in the world without the love of Jesus Christ. Faith is readmitted to the heart, half-shamefully indeed, but yet with an inward joy; and this living part of Christianity on which I have dwelt—infinite Love, not finite Law, as the root of life; endless pursuit, in thought and feeling, of the perfection of God, and imaginative joy in the pursuit; union and communion with nothing less than the divinity of absolute love—this is again becoming more and more an impelling power and life in humanity.

It has a hard battle before it, for its enemies are strong and many; but it is set in array. See that you do your best in that struggle. It will be the struggle of this century to replace the finite and dividing self-interests of society by the infinite and uniting ideals of Love to God and Man; and, in all the practice of religion, to lift the dry barrenness of ethics into the warm fruitfulness of the Gospel of Love; and the limiting selfishness of the practical into the illimitable aspirations of the spiritual imagination, filled with the Love of God.

These three things of which I have spoken are the main elements of the Gospel of Christ, detached from the doctrines and observances woven round them afterwards by the pride of intellect and the desire of power. They are the fountains of that religion of the future in which the churches may merge their differences, which will return to Christ and Christ alone. And they are sufficient, by themselves, for the spirit of man, for his life and death and eternal progress after death; enough, as in the ancient story, for the wise men from the East and the silly shepherds on the hills of Bethlehem—and for all classes between these extremes of knowledge and society. For their region is the soul. And the soul feels what it is to love God and be loved by Him; to love man as God loves him, and die for his cause as Christ died; and, when it loves, to see no end to love, or the life that love first creates and then secures.

IV. It remains for me, in closing this sermon, to speak of the Teacher of these truths, of Jesus Christ. A Christianity without him seems the aspiration of some. A theism without him, yet inevitably infiltrated by him, seems the aspiration of others. These are positions which even those who profess no belief in God do not take up; for while they deny God, they confess the mastery of Jesus. For my part, a Christianity which ignores or depreciates its founder, or a religion which excludes or decries that Master Spirit, is running to its decay and death. The heart of man will not endure the forgetfulness of Jesus. The love of the founder is needful for the religion which he founded. It is its driving power; and all the more now, when the spiritual development of man is forcing us out of what the churches and sects have made of him to what he was himself, and to God as revealed by him. It is through man that God has always revealed Himself. All we know of God we know through man; and it was fitting, if God loved us, that mankind, in the midst of imperfect revelations, should have at least one perfect disclosure of His character and of His love to us—one of us who could say with full conviction, "The works I do, the words I speak, are the Father's works and words; I and my Father are one"; so that we, his brothers, should come, in his following, to speak the speech and do the deeds of God; to say, at last, with him, we and the Father are one. This is the destiny of man, and it is Christ's most blessed revelation.

Well, he came to us. We saw the character and the will of God to us in a life so lived that it has earned the undying love of the world. Jesus was supreme, pure Love, and never, while the heart of man remains, will it forget to answer that love with love. If the future religion of the world is rooted in the simple truths he taught concerning God and the soul of man, the propagation, the inspiration, the driving power of that doctrine is rooted in a personal love of Jesus Christ, such as filled the heart of St. Paul. Only we must clear his image; we must see him as he is.

There is no need to attack or to argue against the images made of him by the theologians who limit his gospel, or bind their creeds like chains around him. Leave them alone. Touch them not; why trouble about them? Our best refutation of them is to disclose him as he really is, to listen to his voice in Palestine, to stand beside his cross, to talk to him as man to man. Then our heart will burn within us and we shall know his power. We shall love him as our Master, love his message, and the Father to whom he leads us, and the human race for which he lived and died and rose again. This is the Love which will give movement and passion and fire to the universal Church. We are men, women, and children, not angels or strong spirits; and we need, to impassionate us, love for a human leader, as well as love for the divine spirit he disclosed to us so fully. And God our Father knew this well, and sent us Christ to love. Centuries of theology, working not in the spiritual but in the intellectual sphere, have thrown veil after veil of mist over his words, his work, his life, over the real personality of the man who walked in the fields of Galilee and taught in the temple of Jerusalem. It will be our best and noblest work in this century, it may even be the creation of a universal religion, to lift the veils, and to ask the world to see him as he is, and love and follow what we see.

1. These, then, are the great, the eternal truths. What more do you want for life and death and the world to come? God in us through love of us; we in God through love of Him; the character of God interwoven for ever with our character; our personal life eternal in Him. That is our inward Being.

2. That inner love streaming forth in love to our brothers who are children of the Love of God, for whom we are bound to forget ourselves, for whom we are called to live and die, who are at one with us for ever in God; whose service is God's service. This is our outward Being.

3. And for our deepest life, the pursuit of perfection, of the unreached ideal of the infinite love, beauty, and truth of God; the uplifting of all morality into love that never knows content; the heightening of laborious perseverance into the easy creativeness of passionate activity; the opening out from the world of the senses and the understanding, of the illimitable regions where God unveils, in joyous eternities, the inexhaustible riches of His Being to the spiritual imagination; the cry which rings like a silver trumpet in the heart—"Be ye perfect as your Father in Heaven is perfect." This is the Being that we shall be.

4. And lastly, with these Truths, the deep impassioned, human love of their Doer and Revealer.

This is the high, serene hill-top of the religion of Christ, full of green pastures and sweet waters where the Good Shepherd feeds his sheep; in the sunshine and fresh airs of God. Below, in the misty plains, men who might be there and who, in the life of the soul, visit this blest region of peace, are fighting phantom wars about the questions with which the analysing understanding has overladen religion—of creeds and ritual and church government, of the sacraments, of the limits of inspiration or of salvation, of the nature of an atonement, of the Unity or Trinity in God, of the Nature of Christ. What are all these questions to us, if we live in the Spirit? They are such stuff as dreams are made of. "Come out of them, my People," saith your God; "live with me in the simplicity of Light and Love. Turn to my Son, in whom I lived for you, and say: 'Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of Eternal Life.'"

DIEPPE FISHING BOATS GOING OUT TO SEA.

SLIPPING into the dying glow
Of the eventide,
Solemn and slow,
The fishing boats go,
Past the form of the crucified:
"Kyrie Eleison, Christe Eleison"—
Into the distance they have gone.
Bless them sweet saints, every one!
Bring them home to mother and wife!
Bring them home to daughter and son!
O, the pathos of human life!
Meetings, and partings, laughter and tears:
Labour and sorrow, and hopes and fears,
And peace, deep peace after strife.

OUR London readers will see from the Sunday Calendar that three of our American guests are to preach to-morrow, the Rev. C. W. Wendté, morning and evening, at Highgate; the Rev. L. G. Wilson, at Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead; and Dr. Crothers, at Little Portland-street Chapel in the morning and at Wandsworth in the evening. Dr. Crothers is to preach on the following Sunday morning in Manchester College Chapel, at Oxford, and we trust that the fact may be made known in the University. We can only urge our friends by no means to miss the rare opportunities thus offered to them.

INTERNATIONAL COUNCIL OF UNITARIAN & OTHER LIBERAL RELIGIOUS THINKERS AND WORKERS.

THE inaugural meetings of this Council were held at Essex Hall on Thursday and Friday, May 30 and 31, under the presidency of the Rev. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, M.A., of Oxford. We published last week a full programme of the proceedings, and we hope from week to week to print the whole series of valuable papers contributed to these meetings of the Council. This week we can only give the President's address, delivered on Thursday morning, and the report of the General Secretary, the Rev. C. W. Wendté, read at the Thursday afternoon session, which contains a record of the steps taken in the formation of the Council.

THE PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS,

BY THE REV. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, M.A., OF OXFORD.

Brethren of the Liberal Faith, the "International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Thinkers," which holds its first meeting to-day, was called into being a year ago at Boston, Massachusetts. My first duty is to express to its founders my gratitude for the high honour conferred upon me by appointment to this presidential chair; my next, to offer the sincerest welcome of English friends to the many distinguished representatives who have gathered from East and West, from North and South, to give us the benefit of their counsel, and to strengthen us by their sympathy.

We meet in the infancy of a new century, whose untrodden ways lie open before us, asking ourselves towards what goal we shape our course, and taking account of the difficulties and helps that may await us on the road. The movement of the last generations has carried to further issues the work which was but half effected by the Reformation four hundred years ago, and has disengaged into clear contrast the opposing principles sometimes designated as Authority and Reason, or picturesquely embodied as the Church and the Revolution. The most cursory observation at once reveals the variety of influences which have contributed to this end. Science has ranged freely through the universe, declaring its right to challenge every faith in the name of fact, and demanding (I do not stop to inquire how far justly) that all beliefs shall submit themselves to proof. Philosophy has sought to penetrate into the inmost recesses of human thought, and by interpreting man to himself has striven to fix his relation also to the world around him, and to God in whom he lives and moves and has his being. The study of history pursued by the same method of ordered inquiry has disentangled the rise and growth of doctrines, tested the claims of sacred institutions, and pushed its way back through great ecclesiastical creations to the birth-hour of churches, and the cradle not only of sects but of religions. Moreover, with constantly widening range, it has travelled round the globe; it has dug up the buried monuments of vanished millenniums; it has deciphered the hymns and prayers of civilisations already hoary with antiquity ere the garden was planted in Eden and the first man was moulded from the clod; it has brought into the light of common day yet older secrets of ethnic affinity and religious faith enshrined in language; and it has shown that the treasure of Christendom, a sacred book, is no exclusive possession after all, as the vast collections of the East, embracing law, morals, philosophy, and religion, have slowly been unfolded to our view.

The total effect of discovery along so many different lines must needs take long to realise, and to work out their results will be the age-long task of human thought. But it is the first principle of the Liberal Faith to admit that these inquiries are all legitimate, to contemplate their advance without fear, and to insist that they shall have the freest opportunity and an unembarrassed way. The process which I have briefly signalised is not confined to any one people, it is not limited to any one church, it is broader even than any one religion. But its influence so far has been most conspicuously seen in Christianity, for this has spread itself all round the globe, has commanded the allegiance of the most progressive races, and is the most powerfully organised alike for social and national aims as well as for missionary endeavour. And within its compass is to be found almost every shade of thought and feeling from repressive distrust (such as would exile a Tolstoi) and unquiet apprehension on the one side to unconditional welcome on the other, as the believer confronts its multitudinous phases, and trembles at their bewildering variety, or exults at the courage of the human spirit which dares to assert such audacious claims and attempt such strenuous tasks.

But the position of the devout truth-seeker is complicated again and again by conditions which limit his freedom and circumscribe his possibilities of action. The great historic churches of Christendom early found it necessary to protect themselves by various safeguards from deviations which threatened to break up their existence altogether. They have adopted creeds, they have prescribed confessions, they have devised methods of Government and forms of worship. They have secured coherence, they have achieved continuity, they have made ritual stately and administration firm; but (to speak broadly) they have shut the door on truth. They offer a rest to the weary, a shelter to the storm-tossed; they possess vast resources—often most nobly used—for the promotion of their own ritual or historic types; and if they have passed through seasons of apathy or somnolence, they have shared in the great quickening of our age; they have called forth an enthusiastic devotion and enlisted a triumphal army of workers, as ignorance and want and suffering and wrong have made to them perpetual appeal. By their constitution, however, they can only with difficulty accommodate themselves to progressive change. Some, indeed, present their confessions avowedly only as historic documents, memorials of a venerable past. In other cases a happy accident may have saved them from prohibiting the movement of a later day, as the Anglican Church finds its formularies fortunately silent on the historical origin and authenticity of its Scriptures. Yet the liberty that is thus secured, is after all but partial. It may be well to curb a too rampant individualism within the bounds of an elaborate church-order; it may be well even for a nation to express through the organisation of centuries its collective adhesion to the forms and offices of religion; it may be well to preserve the ancient pieties and carry them in the name of the state to every city and village in the land. Yet this can only be done at a great price. In the last resort when the limits of compromise have been reached, and the possibilities of divergent interpretation exhausted, it may involve the sacrifice of freedom and truth. And whatever be the gain in other directions, there is an increasing number among every Christian people for whom that price is more than dear, it is impossible.

Must those, then, who find themselves compelled by the need of veracity in worship to stand outside, or those who—accepting the same general presuppositions—are yet able to remain undisturbed within their national communions, abide unfriended and alone? Must they be content with their isolation, and cherish in solitude or in small and scattered groups the convictions which have cost so much? Better so, indeed, than palter with their integrity, or be unfaithful to the light that is in them. But though that position may have been inevitable in the past, it is not necessary now. Among the achievements which make the nineteenth century memorable are those material aids for travel and exchange of thought which have knit the whole earth into a unity undreamed before. It becomes possible, therefore, to gather occasionally for friendly colloquy, for the survey of mutual difficulties, progress, and resource, for the institution of those personal relations which quicken sympathy and sustain lonely effort. Out of such a desire has sprung the Council which meets here to-day. It is first of all a Council of Unitarians, for it owes its inception to them and finds most of its friends within their ranks. But it is in truth of no denomination. It opens its meetings to all who share the Liberal Faith the wide world over, in whatever communion, by whatever name. It offers to them a temporary meeting-place, the opportunity of refreshment and conference in their common cause, the recognition due from sincere workers to sincere workers for the great aims of truth, of liberty, and of religion.

For the field is large and the labour stern. Around us are the struggles of empires and the clash of rival interests, and the huge forces of the world against whose deadening materialism all churches are bound to give untiring battle. Our special share in this great conflict is the promotion of religious truth. To this high goal, indeed, the access has not been made easy, yet the difficulty of the task is the measure of the Father's purpose for us, of His confidence in us, as He calls on us to take our part in the mighty process long ago conceived as the education of humanity into the light, the love, the freedom, of children of God. And the Liberal Faith, if I rightly interpret it, has realised anew the fundamental truth of all religion that "God is spirit." Again and again in the long development of the past has this truth been proclaimed; and again and again even those who saw it most clearly failed to hold it fast, and suffered some lower condition to obscure or distort it. Ancient Israel, soaring to the topmost height of prophecy and psalm, sounded the call to worship for all nations. But the worship was centralised at Jerusalem, and no single house of prayer, even though it were at the mid-point of the earth, could satisfy the universal need. The author of the Fourth Gospel makes, by the mouth of Jesus, the imperishable declaration that the only true worship is in spirit and in truth; it has no local base; it is an act of mind, and knits the soul and God into immediate relations, to which place is indifferent. Yet even he concentrates the "light that lighteth every man" into a single person, and in his name asserts that "no man cometh unto the Father but by me." I will not now ask whether this is intended as the utterance of the ideal and all pervading Word or the actual Jesus. The contrast must suffice to point my argument that no single historic religion can in reality become universal. In other words, the Liberal Faith of the future will be no longer dependent on a book, even though that book be the New Testament; still less on a priesthood, whatever force a temporary revival of sacerdotalism may here or there display.

The survey of the progress of religions shows clearly enough what part these agencies may play in specific stages of their development. It is a stage which lasts long, and plants deep in the heart of entire races an almost immovable intensity of faith, for it gathers up their holiest experience, and enshrines their most precious hope. Yet the religious condition of Europe, to say nothing of the spiritual lethargy of the East, is a sufficient warning against the dangers of sacerdotal ascendancy. We have seen it in our own day range itself on the basis of Vatican decrees as the uncompromising foe of independence of thought, the untiring opponent of human activity beyond the narrow limits which it chooses to prescribe. We have seen it intriguing in politics, hand in hand with falsehood, the brutal instigator of race-hatred, in the selfish pursuit of its own ends. Not all the glories of its past, not the long roll of its martyrs and its saints, not the triumphs of its art, not the fervour and often the purity of its devotion, not the variety of its services to human need, can blind us to the fact that the great Church of Rome, though it send out its priests to every country of the globe, still bears within it a prophecy of doom, as the human spirit claims the freedom which is its inalienable right. But the strife with an organisation so vast, so closely knit, so full of resource, so varied in its power to minister to many of man's deepest yearnings, is full of pain. Those of us who have been nourished in liberties won centuries ago, can hardly realise the strain which it imposes on solitary combatants, the difficulty and the weariness of the fight. To all such brave champions, and some of them are among us to-day, from Central and Southern Europe, we offer our respectful sympathy; and we beg of them to accept the support of our conviction that the first principle of the Liberal Faith is the right of the soul to an open way to God; no church can limit it to chartered channels; always and everywhere God's grace is freely given; always and everywhere the Father's welcome is ready for the children who seek Him in trust, humility, and love. This is the truth which we have learnt from Jesus. This is the Gospel we have to carry through the world.

The claims of the religion of the spirit, however, do not encounter their only obstacles in the priesthoods of the great Catholic Churches, whether Greek, Roman, or Anglican. The doctrine of the infallibility of the Bible has been tacitly abandoned by almost all responsible theologians; yet there are many signs—such as the struggle for the control of education in this country, the pressure exerted on teachers, the language of popular hymns, it must even be added the occasional silence and evasion of Biblical commentators—that doctrines once based on the literal truth of the Bible still cast a baleful shadow over the thought and life of the masses, and expose those who have abandoned them to social mistrust, amounting sometimes almost to persecution. Confident in the progress of truth, assured of the abiding roots of religion within the mind, the conscience, the heart, we have sometimes smiled at the petty acts of ungenerous superstition. But there are those who carry the flag of freedom almost alone; they are confronted by influences which are the more difficult to combat because they sometimes decline definite issues and refuse honest intellectual trial. Immense as have been the modifications of the old orthodoxy, those who are best acquainted with the average thought of Protestant Christianity warn us how much of the old leaven of dogmatism and exclusiveness still remains; and isolated sentinels at distant outposts bid us remember that the field is yet by no means won. Even among the most cultivated affection still invests the founder of Christianity with an ideal significance which the record, it is admitted, does not justify; and claims for his religion some kind of final or "absolute" character. But the modern study of the New Testament has shown us how mingled are its universal elements with the accidents of time and country, of local circumstance and frustrated expectation. To understand it aright requires, as we now know, an education of the historic and religious imagination, which is indeed one of the noblest exercises of the human mind, but which cannot be everywhere demanded or pursued. And for this reason alone it does not seem likely that any single or specific faith can ever absorb all others into one world-wide Church. We are learning slowly how closely dependent is any one generation on those which preceded it, and we cannot divest ourselves of our inheritance. No nation can transfer to another its own past. Contact and sympathy may slowly modify the old instincts or gradually create new social ideals. But the days of religious conquest by authority have gone by. The "people of the book," as Islam calls the Christians, will use it no longer as having dominion over their faith, but as the Apostle Paul wished to be to his converts, the helper of their joy.

And yet the aspiration after unity will not be repressed. In divers ways it is already at work, drawing together churches that were once divided, creating larger groups with broader liberties, breaking down barriers of suspicion or reserve by the discovery of common sympathies and the hope of common ends. In such tentative movements let us heartily rejoice, even though they are not yet strong enough to include us all. Beyond their scope, however, lies a great spiritual ideal still wider and more comprehensive. The Christian finds it in what he believes to have been the fundamental conceptions of his Master, disentangled from their temporary envelopments, and translated into the larger knowledge of our time. The clearer perception of this ideal, the endeavour to realise it, the strength and support for action derives from it, are, indeed, among the most hopeful features of our age. The passionate conviction that it pervades the universe and links all history into one mighty whole, has received fresh support along many lines of thought, and is the deepest note of poetry, of philosophy, and science. To disengage its great underlying ideas, to give noble form to the emotions it excites, to bring them into relation with the loftiest historic ideals, and make them potent in the conduct of life—this must be the task of the preachers of the Liberal Faith. For three mighty objects are always before us—the world, man, and God. The ordered interpretation of Nature is indeed the most significant triumph of an age that has perhaps added more to the content of human knowledge than all the preceding efforts of the race. In different forms the eager pursuers found themselves challenged by theology, till they in their turn took the offensive, and were not slow to proclaim in the name of truth a holy war. But the conflict, though echoes of it are still occasionally heard, is practically over. For the closer analysis of the fundamental conceptions of science has shown that in the last resort they transcend experience as much as do those of religion. The fearless investigator is, after all, a devout believer in the ultimate unity of the physical energies acting through the modes of motion which alone are manifest to sense. He is, moreover, convinced that the further he advances the less and less likely is it that his quest will be put to intellectual confusion, the more and more certain is he that the world will respond to his inquiries and in some form or other will answer to his thought. Mysteries there may be, passing his undertanding, but mystery is not disorder, and is the home and not the obstacle of faith. The Power which works through the Great Order is intrinsically one and everlasting; and the whole universe is woven out of a tissue of relations which human reason slowly unravels, so that external things perpetually justify the processes and action of intelligence. Nay, their final constituents, which science can reckon up though it cannot display them to sight or touch, are in a sense the creations of our thought. Yet they did not wait for us to appear upon the scene. The thought which they express was there before us; and so the world wears the aspect of one phase or manifestation of the Infinite Mind, and science thinks the thoughts of God after him. And the Liberal Faith, as I understand it, adopts this position without reserve. It no longer regards science as something to be reconciled; still less as something to be dreaded or evaded; it accepts it with whole-hearted loyalty, and insists on applying its canons through the whole field of Nature and History. It plants life firmly and faithfully on the world's steadfastness. In its joy and beauty it finds the sympathy of the Eternal touching with its own grace all seasonal vicissitude. And even in its suffering and grief it learns to say "Bless the Lord, O my soul," for it is conscious that it can still rely upon the order and welfare of the whole, and in this faith wounded affection finds healing, and is supported in sacrifice even unto death. For harmony with the everlasting Will alone is peace.

But within the world stands man. It might be thought that after the uncounted millenniums since he first appeared upon this planet, it is somewhat late in the day to claim that he is only now beginning to understand himself. Yet the last century has, for the first time, laid the foundations of a true study in opening up the real story of his past. It has shown us how to trace the origins of his physical frame, to note the rude commencements of his thought, to find in primitive usage the germs of the mighty structures of law and government, of the lofty achievements of art, philosophy, and religion. The newly-founded science of anthropology is indeed conceived at present on a somewhat narrow scale, but it will gradually become more and more clear that in man, his history and power, his thoughts and aspirations, his conscience, affections, will, lies the clue to the interpretation of his place in the world, and the ultimate source and seat of all religion. And as such nil humani can be indifferent to us. But for this end not all experience is of equal value. From a very early stage in man's progress faith and morals have stood out in decisive prominence among the forces of his advance, and have lived under some form of close alliance. The investigation of the nature of conscience and the discovery that from land to land and creed to creed the contents of the moral ideal in its higher developments have shown frequent resemblance, if not positive identity, have undermined the doctrine of man's total depravity. Morality is no longer conceived as dependent on positive commands of Heaven, revealed in supernatural law or by a supernatural person; it is discerned as a part of the social order because involved in the constitution of humanity itself. And there the unique character of man's moral judgments has been clearly disengaged as the very centre and essence of his life; they cannot be reduced into any other terms of quantity or kind; and that good which he recognises as having authority over him, as claiming his service and demanding the consecration of his will, is seen to be no other than the reflection in his own soul of the infinite purpose which enspheres all our being. The Liberal Faith, therefore, will be above all things ethical; it will demand the highest in personal character; it will palter with no favourite sins; and the mighty causes of social justice and international right, of popular welfare, temperance, purity, must ever engage its unfaltering support. It is possible, indeed, that our analysis of the moral life may hereafter go deeper than has hitherto seemed possible. Thus far, the chief subject of examination has been the soul, considered as the seat of individual experience. But new vistas of inquiry are now opening out into the structure of society, the ties that link men each to each, the subtle bonds, but dimly recognised in our common life, which unite the human units into communities, and through the family expand into the State. May it not be that here we shall ultimately find the moral analogue in the experience of the race to that reason which gives man kinship with the world? And shall we not thus learn that, in some way beyond our power now to apprehend, each separate historic development has its place in the vast whole, where God's providence perpetually transmutes the lower elements into the higher, and out of primeval struggle brings forth great ideals of righteousness. In the universe there is order, in humanity is life, and that life is something more than the sum of all the individual persons which may at any moment be reckoned by a census embracing the whole globe. It is the sum of all their connexions and successions, which are not self-made but follow hidden laws, so that the mighty web of conscious thought and feeling and endeavour rests on a deep underlying unity, the mind of God revealing itself through the generations of our experience, and folding all our separate purposes within the scope of his Almighty will.

The faith which thus reposes on God as the Author and Upholder of the world, the Creator, Sustainer, Guide, Inspirer of man, will draw unfailing guidance from the great historic religions. It will find in them the highest organised expressions, under the forms of race and time and country, of man's enduring relation to the Eternal. It will recognise with undying gratitude its debt to those prophet souls who have flashed light into dark places so that all might see, and given personal shape to the highest spiritual truths. But it will not insist that Christ shall be its centre any more than Plato. Religion can have but one object, the everlasting God; one centre on which it rests immovable, the infinite Spirit in which we live and move and have our being. Let us indeed join willing hands with those who may firmly maintain their own communion with their risen Lord, but can yet recognise that for other souls there are divers ways within the Father's grace. Must it not, however, be said that the function of Christianity conceived internationally among the races of the world is not to conquer and subdue, but to inspire, to infuse its own ideals and impart some of its own life, and in its turn perhaps to realise with quickening sense of brotherhood the unity of mankind, in that "God hath made of one every nation of men to dwell on all the face of the earth," and so win new confidence in its central truths? For this great end may this Council do its modest work. All gifts of thought and love, of faithful labour and lowly worship, can be laid upon this altar without fear or reserve. All service for human welfare finds here its consecration and support. Difficulties there are; they exist only to be overcome. Hazards there will be; they call for great ventures of trust. Let us find our sufficiency where prophets and saints have found it before us, a sufficiency that will not fail us though we be not worthy to unloose the latchet of their shoes, and can do no more than give a cup of cold water to some thirsting brother on the way. Before us is the boundless future, and the vast processions of our race are already marshalling themselves to take their places when we are here no more. What preparation shall we have made for them? When creeds decay and churches totter, shall they be left without a faith? Be it ours to open some blind eyes to discern the sanctuary not made with hands, to unstop some deaf ears to the voice of the Spirit heard more and more clearly within the heart of purity and reverence and love. Our stay and strength, our source and goal is God,

One God, who ever lives and loves,
One God, one law, one element,
And one far off divine event,
Towards which the whole creation moves.

THE REPORT OF THE GENERAL SECRETARY,

BY THE REV. CHARLES W. WENDTÉ.

Representatives of many nationalities and Churches, we are met here in friendly conference at the invitation of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers.

This Council was organised on May 25, 1900, at Boston, in the United States, by foreign Delegates and others in attendance on the seventy-fifth anniversary of the founding of the American Unitarian Association.

The mutual interchange of liberal ideas and friendly sentiments among the free-thinking men and women of diverse nationalities and religious antecedents who had been brought together, created among them a general desire for more frequent reunion of like nature, and a continuance of the fraternal and inspiring relations so auspiciously begun. It was agreed that a permanent organisation should be effected to bring into closer union, for exchange of ideas, mutual service and the promotion of their common aims, the scattered liberal congregations and isolated Thinkers and Workers for Religious Freedom in many lands.

At a meeting called in Channing Hall, Boston, by the Rev. Samuel A. Eliot, D.D., President of the American Unitarian Association, addresses favouring the formation of an International Association of Religious Liberals were made by Protap Chunder Mozoomdar, of India; Rev. Clay Maccauley, of Japan; Professor George Boros, of Hungary; Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, of England; Rev. James Hocart, of Belgium; Rev. George Batchelor, Revs. Merle C. Wright and Charles W. Wendté, of the United States, and others.

A Committee, consisting of Messrs. Wendté, Bowie, Boros, Hocart, Mozoomdar and Batchelor, was appointed to prepare a plan of organisation.

This Committee reported the following day, May 25, to the reassembled Delegates, their recommendations as follows:—

First.—That the proposed Association be called "The International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers."

Second.—That the object of this Council shall be to open communication with those in all lands who are striving to unite pure Religion and perfect Liberty, and to increase fellowship and co-operation among them.

Third.—That as this purpose demands neither a fixed constitution nor elaborate official organisation, these two provisions be the only stated Articles of the Association, and that all questions concerning the best method to be employed in the conduct of the interests committed to said Council be left to the future to determine as experience, opportunity, correspondence and conference shall disclose the scope and possibilities of its work.

Fourth.—That the officers of the Council consist of a President and a General Secretary, who, together with an Executive Committee, shall be chosen at each meeting to carry out its objects.

Finally, the Committee on organisation recommended that the first general meeting of the Council be held in London, in May, 1901, and thereafter every two or three years, and so far as possible, in different countries.

The Executive Committee later completed the organisation of the Council by the choice of Professor J. Estlin Carpenter as Chairman and the Rev. Charles W. Wendté as General Secretary.

The British and Foreign Unitarian Association having extended a hospitable invitation to the Council to hold its forthcoming meeting in London under their auspices, a local London Committee was appointed, of which Rev. James Harwood, B.A., is Chairman, Miss E. M. Lawrence and Mr. Ion Pritchard, Treasurers, and the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, Secretary.

It is simple justice to say that the labour of arranging for the present meeting, preparing its programmes, and providing for the entertainment of its Delegates, has fallen almost entirely on the local London Committee. The Council owes it a debt of gratitude which can only be repaid by a large and earnest participation in the meetings for which it has made such wise and generous provision.

At an early session of the American section of the Executive Committee, the General Secretary was instructed to extend his correspondence with Religious Liberals throughout the world, and to invite their co-operation with the Council. In accordance with this instruction, letters were addressed by the Secretary to a large number of individuals in various countries, who were known to be prominently identified with Liberal Religion.

These communications set forth the nature and aims of the Council, and solicited their interest in it. Later in the year, as the correspondence increased, a circular letter was prepared and sent to many additional addresses.

The response to our invitation has been general and cordial, and more than equalled our expectations. Here and there a person addressed, from timidity or indifference perhaps, failed to acknowledge our communication, but for the most part the answers returned were full of sympathy with our purpose, and conveyed to us the assurance of personal goodwill and co-operation. Many of the letters received disclose the loneliness and hardships borne by isolated liberal thinkers and congregations throughout the world, their heroic witness for Truth and Freedom, and their joy at the opportunity presented them by this Council to come into fraternal relations with their fellow Liberals in Europe and America.

Among others the following representatives of advanced religious opinion have indicated to us their sympathy with our movement, and many of them are here in person to take part in the proceedings of the Council:—

With so large and widespread a response, it has become more and more apparent to us during the year, that the formation of this Council was timely and needed, and that we are inaugurating a movement of profound significance and great promise of usefulness in behalf of Liberal Religion. The remarkable advance in civilisation during the past century has brought the nations of the earth into closer and more complex relations, and made them conscious, as never before, of their independence and mutual obligations. The ultimate "Federation of the World" for ideal and fraternal ends is no longer merely a poet's dream; it is an axiom of sound political ethics. The organisation of international effort, which has already accomplished so much in the interests of industry and commerce, learned scholarship, scientific research and political action, should, with even greater reason, be extended to the field of religion. It should be recognised more universally, that nativity and language and religious antecedents form no insurmountable barrier to an International union of hearts and hands for the religious enlightenment and emancipation of mankind.

Already this conviction has led to great International Assemblies of Orthodox Christian Believers in the interest of their particular church or sect. Thus, in 1867, the Pan-Anglican Synod of Protestant Episcopal Bishops met at Lambeth by invitation of the Archbishop of Canterbury, and has met thrice since.

In 1877 the Pan-Presbyterian Alliance held its first Session at Edinburgh. Forty-nine separate churches, twenty-five different countries, and 20,000 congregations were represented at this gathering, which has since been repeated at Philadelphia and Belfast.

A Pan-Methodist Conference was held in 1881 in London, at which 400 delegates represented twenty-eight branches of Methodism and 6,000,000 of communicants. In 1891 a second Ecumenical Methodist Conference was held in Washington, which represented 20,000,000 of people worshipping in that communion.

Still more notable in its scope and influence was the Parliament of Religions at the World's Fair in Chicago in 1893, which lasted seventeen days, and was participated in by a large number of delegates—Protestants, Roman Catholic and Greek Catholics, as well as Non-Christian Believers.

The same conviction and fraternal impulse have led to the organisation of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers. It is believed that its Sessions, held every two or three years in different countries, will attract public attention and lend influence to its united testimony for advanced religious and ethical ideas. It is believed furthermore, that it will strengthen the hearts and hands of lonely workers for religious truth and freedom in many lands, and that the religious bodies who may unite with it will feel themselves growing in power and influence by the consciousness of larger fraternal relations and a broader organic life. In this good hope we meet to-day under these happy auspices to inaugurate what we trust will become a permanent and widely influential movement for the union in all lands and among all peoples of pure Religion and perfect Liberty.

THE annual meeting of the Society for the Relief of Aged and Infirm Protestant Dissenting Ministers was held at the Sunday-school Union House, 56, Old Bailey, May 28. The chair was taken by Philip Cadby, Esq. The report shows that during the year £837 were distributed among seventy aged and infirm ministers, a decrease of twelve grants as compared with the number reported for the previous year, this being due chiefly to an exceptionally large number of deaths among the beneficiaries. Numerous applications are, however, already coming in, and the claims on the Society for the ensuing year promise to be large. Contributions in aid of its funds will be thankfully received by the treasurer, Philip Cadby, Esq., 24, St. Peter's-square, Hammersmith, W., or by the Rev. P. G. Scorey, secretary, Gibbons House, Billingshurst, Sussex.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

The King's Son in Egypt.

AT the service for teachers and elder scholars at Essex Hall, on Whit-Sunday afternoon, Mr. Page Hopps read an old poem, translated from the Syriac, containing a curious and beautiful parable of human life. The poem is found in the Syriac version of the book known as the "Acts of St. Thomas," and it is supposed to have been written not more than 300 years after the time of Christ, by a member of one of the Gnostic sects.

Mr. Hopps took for text a verse from the book of the prophet Jeremiah (iii. 19), "How shall I put thee among the children, and give thee a pleasant land, a goodly heritage of the hosts of the nations? and I said, Thou shalt call me Father, and shalt not turn away from me." He explained that the parable showed how the human soul was sent into the world, to fight its own battle, and gain the great treasure of character, that it might then return to the Father in heaven and enter upon the heavenly life.

The soul is pictured as a King's son, who has already lived in the heavenly land. He is sent by his Father to the land of Egypt (the world), first laying aside the heavenly robe that he had worn, to fetch the one pearl (like the pearl of great price in the Gospel),

> Which is in the midst of the sea
> Hard by the loud-breathing serpent.

That is the pearl of character, which he must wrest from the serpent, the spirit of evil in the world.

But when the King's son came to Egypt he at first lost heart. He waited till the serpent should be asleep that he might take the pearl away, and he clothed himself like the people of that country, being afraid that they would insult him as a stranger, and rouse the serpent against him. But they saw through him, and gave him of their food to eat, till he became worldly like them, and forgot he was a King's son; and he forgot the pearl for which he had been sent, and lay in a deep sleep.

Then his Father sent a letter to rouse him, and remind him of his great purpose, and the glorious robe which he must again be worthy to wear. The letter came to him in the form of an eagle, with fluttering wings, and roused him from his sleep. That was conscience speaking to him again, rousing him from the base slumber of selfishness to the strife with evil by which he would gain his true character. He arose and began to charm the serpent, lulling him to sleep with his Father's name, and the name of Jesus the "next in rank." Then he took the pearl, and laid aside the filthy garb he had worn in Egypt, and turned to go back to his Father's house. As he drew near, messengers met him with his heavenly robe, and he was clothed again as the King's son, and mingled with the nobles and princes of the land, and was joyfully received.

This parable, Mr. Hopps said, was meant for us all. It did not matter whether we said Egypt or London, Syria or Great Britain. It was a parable about every boy and girl, every man or woman, who was sent into the world to fight the good fight of honourable character, to become worthy of the heavenly life. That was the chief thing, about which we had to care more than for anything else in the whole world.

MEETING OF PROTEST ON THE SOUTH AFRICAN WAR.

IN order to provide an opportunity for some collective expression of opinion concerning the present war and its consequences, a meeting in connection with the May Meetings was held at Clifford's Inn Hall on Tuesday, May 28, at five o'clock. The room was filled to its utmost capacity with delegates and ministers attending the National and International Unitarian meetings, and by other friends. The chair was occupied by the Rev. P. H. WICKSTEED, who reported having received sympathetic letters from the Revs. S. A. Steinthal, W. J. Jupp, P. W. Clayden, and Dr. Drummond, Principal of Manchester College, Oxford. The last-mentioned said:—"I am very sorry that I cannot be at the meeting to-morrow, in order to express, at least by my silent presence, my disapproval—I may say, my horror—at the present state of things in South Africa. Whatever view may be taken of the origin of the war, it ought to be clear that what we now require is a wise, generous, and Christian policy, and not one dictated by passion and vindictiveness, and such a policy ought to be initiated by the larger and stronger State. Cry aloud, spare not; lift up thy voice like a trumpet."

The CHAIRMAN said that it was untrue to state that it was too late now to inquire into the origin of the war. Wrong ideas concerning that origin vitiated the arguments of even the wisest, and it was the duty of every one seriously to study the history of the whole matter; we cannot expect to understand the present if we have not some real knowledge of the past. Pentecost was the undoing of the misfortune of the Tower of Babel. The confusion of tongues arises through ambitious schemes of human glorification; the gift of the spirit—the spirit of love—makes men become of one speech, and enables them to understand each other across distances of space and nationality; it was that Pentecostal spirit we needed in the national life.

The Rev. J. PAGE HOPPS, in a stirring and characteristic speech, moved the following resolution:—

> This meeting protests against the annexation of the South African republics as morally and politically wrong.

During a political life of forty years, he said, he had never known England so humiliated, so disgraced, and so disliked abroad. The very methods of conducting the war were such as to gain us universal opprobrium. It had come to his knowledge that people in Capetown had offered to receive women and children into their houses in order to protect them from the fate of the refuge camps, but the authorities had refused their permission. Many people seemed to work on the assumption that everything that makes for the good of the empire must be morally right. This was neither Christianity nor justice. He did not believe that it was absolutely essential that the British Empire should exist, but it was essential that everywhere justice should be done.

The resolution was seconded by Mr. J. R. MACDONALD, who instanced the case of Scotland as one that might prove a suggestive parallel. The motion was carried with three dissentients.

Mr. F. W. LAWRENCE then moved:—

That this meeting views with sorrow and shame the events that have taken place in South Africa during the past two years, especially the burning of farms and the treatment of the wives and children of the Boers still fighting for their independence.

In the course of an earnest plea for more humane methods, he said that our concern was with wrong ideas, and it was against them we had to fight. We were told that all that was now happening in South Africa was a necessary accompaniment of war, that this was the most humane war ever waged; we really never had had an opportunity of seeing plainly what war meant until the present time, but this everyone knew: that war means the killing of men and not the harassing of women and children and the depriving them of the comforts and even necessaries of life. On the admission of Government reports farms had been burned for no sufficient reason. He calculated that at least 60,000 women and children were herded in the refuge camps; that represented nearly the whole dependant population of the two Republics. Speaking from experience, he said that some camps were well managed and well supplied with food, but those were close to Cape Colony; the same could not be said of a large number to be found at different places in the Free State. Children were starved to death because food suitable for them had not been obtained. The death-rate of children was 250 per 1,000, a rate which simply spells murder. No matter what our creed or politics or belief about the right or wrong of the war, we must all unite in denouncing this new murder of the innocents that is being carried out in our name.

The resolution was seconded by Mr. J. L. HAMMOND, of the Speaker, supported by the Revs. E. W. LUMMIS and C. D. BADLAND, and carried unanimously.

A resolution in favour of International Arbitration was moved by Mr. HODGSON PRATT, seconded by Dr. LAWSON DODD, and also carried unanimously.

At the close of the meeting a collection of over £24 was made for the Boer Women and Children's Distress Fund.

THE sun will shine and the clouds will lift;
The snow will melt though high it drift;
Across the ocean there is a shore—
Must we learn the lesson o'er and o'er?

To know there is sun when the clouds droop low,
To believe in the violets under the snow,
To watch on the bows for the land that shall rise—
This is victory in disguise.—Anon.

SOME psychologists declare that after a person's habits are fixed, say at the age of twenty-five or thirty, very little—if any—change can be made in the disposition. But what a dreary prospect! Such statements are of slight consequence in the light of our modern belief that the spirit can triumph over the flesh. A man can change a habit in a few days, sometimes in one day, if he puts his mind fixedly upon it. In fact, all our thinking tends to establish habits; it is a matter for the will to decide whether or not our ideas shall become fixed,—Dresser.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Belfast: York-street.—On Sunday, May 26, special services were held to celebrate the tenth anniversary of the opening of the new buildings. Care was taken to extend an invitation to these services to all who have been in any way connected with the congregation for the last twelve years, and members of neighbouring churches were also invited to take the opportunity of showing sympathy with the work carried on by minister and congregation under exceptional difficulties. The response thereto was as satisfactory as could be expected, as the services were held at a great holiday time (Whit-Sunday). Some unable to attend sent contributions to the offertory, with friendly greetings and good wishes. The Rev. M. S. Dunbar, M.A., conducted the morning service, the Rev. W. H. Drummond, M.A., that in the afternoon, and the Rev. A. Turner that in the evening. At evening service Sir James Haslett, M.P. for North Belfast, though a leading Presbyterian, was present to show his appreciation of the minister's work, and at one or other of the services it was pleasant to see members from all our Belfast churches taking round the collection plates. The organist and choir of All Souls' conducted the music of the afternoon service, and special solos were sung at morning and evening services by members of York-street choir.

Ipswich.—The Rev. Lucking Tavener, just before the sermon on Sunday evening, paid a passing tribute to the many qualities possessed by the late Miss Durning Smith, and in a few touching sentences expressed the sorrow and loss which would be felt by all members of the Unitarian church both at home and abroad. At the conclusion of the service the organist, Miss Poole, played in a most sympathetic manner the "Dead March in Saul," the congregation meanwhile standing in their pews. The organ, a splendidly-toned instrument, was only presented to the chapel a few months ago by the late Miss Durning Smith, who, at the time of presenting it, characteristically wished her gift to be anonymous.

Killinchy.—Mrs. Ormiston Chant conducted special services on May 19, when nearly £60 was raised for the new organ fund.

London: Bermondsey.—The service on Sunday last was conducted by the Rev. G. Carter, who, in his address, said he had feared, till a few days since, that he, the first minister of the church, would have the sad duty of conducting its closing service; but he was glad to be able to announce that worship would be continued under the direction of the Provincial Assembly, and he trusted that the happy augury of Whit Sunday would be realised in a Pentecostal infusion of enthusiasm; and that though there might never be a great multitude gathered together in that place, there would be an increase in the comfort of God's Holy Spirit to all who did attend. The time of opening service in the future would, he said, revert to seven o'clock in the evening.

Pudsey.—In the advertisement of donations received, in last week's INQUIRER, for John Okerfoot, read John O. Kerfoot.

KIRKCALDY UNITARIAN CHURCH.

This Church was opened on 25th March, 1899, on which date the last appeal for assistance was advertised in this paper. The Congregation have hesitated to ask for Donations again, partly because the public have had so many calls upon them in the last two years, and partly for the reason that they have already been handsomely helped by many good friends. But now that their Minister, the Rev. A. Ernest Parry, has settled at Liscard, they are anxious to clear off the adverse balance of about £120 before the appointment of a successor, and therefore venture to appeal once more.

Donations will be thankfully received by H. B. MELVILLE, 92, High-street, Kirkcaldy, who begs to acknowledge the following sums:—

The plan of this little book was to select twelve hymns from the collection published by the Association. The twelve hymns were to be such as it would be good to learn by heart, and they must be by different authors, whose lives would furnish matter for an interesting biographical sketch with some useful lesson in it, while the hymns also should provide material for further lessons.—From Preface.

CHRONICLE OF THE WEEK.

II.

THE week, which we began in our last issue briefly to chronicle, has run its course, ending, perhaps we must acknowledge, on the tenth day, although it seems still to be lingering with us in the pleasantest of recollections, and we shall not quite believe that it is over until its story is completely told. Here we must go back to the first day of the International Council, and the rest of the chronicle is, in fact, concerned almost entirely with that new and most fruitful interest.

THURSDAY, MAY 30.

The programme of the first session of the International Council, after the welcome to the Foreign Delegates, which we recorded last week, announced a paper by the Rev. S. M. Crothers, D.D., on "The Sympathy of Religions"; but it was, in fact, an address spoken entirely without notes, and made a deep impression on the crowded audience. We publish this week what aimed at being a verbatim report of this address. It has been revised by Dr. Crothers, and yet we cannot hope that it is a perfect reproduction of his words, nor can any report reproduce the tones of a speaker to whom it was a delight to listen or the spirit of the occasion, when he made his appeal for the true Catholic ideal. The address by Mr. Graham Wallas on "Religion and Empire" was also spoken and not read, and made an impression in its own way no less searching and effective than that by Dr. Crothers.

After luncheon came the report by the Secretary, the Rev. C. W. Wendté, which we published last week, and four papers — "The Contribution of France to Religious Progress," by the Rev. E. Fontanès, of Paris (spoken in French); "The Struggle with Catholicism in Belgium," by the Rev. J. Hocart, of Brussels; "The Liberal Mennonites of Holland," by the Rev. F. C. Fleischer; and "The Thoughts and Experiences of a Liberal Religious Thinker and Worker in Russia," by Vladimir Tchertkoff. Mr. Jozan's paper, which followed on the programme, had to be postponed to the following day. The striking personality of Mr. Tchertkoff, and the largely autobiographical character of his paper, gave it a peculiar interest, and no utterance during the whole course of the meetings was more keenly followed or with deeper sympathy than his. This paper we hope to publish in full next week.

Other Meetings.

That same afternoon, after a luncheon to Delegates of District and Local Sunday-school Societies at the Salisbury Hotel, under the presidency of the Rev. H. E. Dowson, the inaugural meeting of the National Conference Guilds' Union was held at Little Portland-street Chapel—a meeting which we report this week in another column. Later in the afternoon the Rev. C. W. Wendté read a paper on "Art in the Service of Religion" to a conference of ministers, held at Essex Hall on the invitation of the London Unitarian Ministers' Meeting.

THE PUBLIC MEETING.

At eight o'clock a public meeting was held in Westminster Town Hall, when the large hall was completely filled, and an overflow meeting was held in the Council Chamber. Those who filled the large hall, both floor and galleries had compensation for the crowd and heat in some pleasant music before the meeting began, but the audience in the Council Chamber had a decided advantage in atmosphere and the comfort of their seats. The same speakers addressed both meetings, Dr. Blake Odgers presiding over the chief meeting, and Mr. Oswald Nettlefold in the Council Chamber. Hymns were sung, and the concluding benediction was pronounced by the Rev. S. A. Steinthal.

It was originally intended that Sir John Brunner, as President of the B. and F.U.A., should take the chair, but he was prevented by another important engagement from being present, and when the recent bereavement in his family prevented Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence also from coming, Dr. Odgers, as President-Elect of the B. and F.U.A., undertook the duty. In his opening address he referred to their position as Unitarians, and to the character of the trusts on which most of their places of worship were held, dedicated simply to the worship of God, thus leaving them open to the new light of truth, from whatever quarter it might come.

The speeches of Dr. Drummond, Professor Réville, and Dr. Crothers, which followed, are printed in full elsewhere in our present issue. The Rev. Joseph Wood then spoke on "The Opportunities of the Young in the New Century," claiming for many elder men that they were young in spirit, as Channing was "always young for liberty," and making an earnest and eloquent appeal to the young people to realise that the new century was their opportunity for service, and to remember that above all things it was men of character that were needed for the salvation of their country.

The Rev. C. W. Wendté followed with on address on "The True Basis of Religious Unity," in which he pointed to the great claims of the Roman Catholic Church, which history had never justified, and after pointing to the divisions of Protestantism, affirmed that unity could not be achieved by the way of intellectual agreement, but only through union in the spirit of Christ's life. In conclusion, he quoted the basis of Christian union adopted a few years ago by the National Conference of the Unitarian Churches of America:—

> These churches accept the religion of Jesus, holding, in accordance with his teaching, that practical religion is summed up in love to God and love to man.
> And we invite to our working fellowship any who, while differing from us in belief, are in general sympathy with our spirit and our practical aims.

Thus, he hoped, if other churches would adopt a similar platform, that they might all come into "the unity of the spirit and the bond of peace."

The last speech was to have been by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie on "The Religious Outlook in England To-day." This speech, Mr. Bowie said, he had made at the overflow meeting, but time was not left for it in the chief meeting, and after a few words from him of gratitude and confidence for the future, the doxology was sung, and the benediction brought the meeting to a close.

FRIDAY, MAY 31.

Friday brought to us yet another fresh and pleasant morning; in fact, there was not a day without sunshine in the whole week; and if the throng was not so great on Friday as on the previous day, that was due to the fact that some of our visitors had been compelled by other duties to return home, rather than to any abatement of interest in the proceedings of the Council.

The Devotional Service was conducted by the Rev. L. P. Jacks, who spoke of the true inwardness of the Liberal movement in religion, in an address the substance of which we hope before long to be able to offer to our readers. Six papers were read at the morning session, the first of which, by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, on "Religious Thought in England at the Close of the Nineteenth Century," we intend to publish next week or in the following week as space permits. He was followed by Professor Eerdmans, of Leiden, on "Liberal Religious Thought within the Dutch Reformed Church," and Professor Montet, of Geneva, who read his paper in French, on "Switzerland Three Centuries after Calvin." Then followed the disappointment, for which we had been prepared, and the President's announcement that Mrs. Humphry Ward had been prevented by illness not only from being present, but from writing her promised paper on "The Preservation of the Christian Ideal amid Changing Forms of Thought." In part of the time allotted to Mrs. Ward in the programme Professor Bonet-Maury was good enough to read the brief paper, which we publish this week as an interesting sequel to Professor Réville's address at the Westminster Town Hall, and then the President read a good part of the paper on "The Social Activities of the Age and their Religious Significance," contributed by Professor Pfleiderer, of Berlin, who, as we have already stated, to his and our great regret was prevented by pressing University duties and other claims from attending the meetings of the Council. The last paper of the morning was by the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed on "Wordsworth's Ideals and the Nineteenth Century," which was a most impressive address, setting Wordsworth before us as the true prophet of his century and of this new time.

After luncheon the Rev. J. Harwood read part of the paper on "The Liberal Movement in Religion in Italy," by the Rev. Tony André, of Florence, who was present, but because of his imperfect command of English modestly shrank from reading it himself. The other papers of the afternoon were as follows:—"Our People and the Revelation of her Soul in Folk-lore and Poetry," by the Rev. N. Jozan, of Budapest; "The Free Religious Communities of Germany," by Dr. Schieler, of Königsberg; "Present-day Religious Problems in Hungary," by Professor George Boros, of Kolozsvar (read, in his regretted absence, by the Rev. C. J. Street); and "Church and State in America," by the Rev. C. W. Wendté. In addition to these there were other papers, which there was no time to read, but which will all be published in due course. The Council adjourned shortly before four o'clock, the President having occupied the chair throughout the two days' meetings.

The Receptions.

On Friday afternoon from 4 to 6 the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor of London gave a reception at the Mansion House, which was attended by the Foreign Delegates and a large number (about 600) of those attending the National and International meetings. In the course of the afternoon the Lord Mayor spoke a few words of very cordial welcome to his guests, after which the Rev. J. E. Carpenter, as President of the International Council, acknowledged the hospitality which had been extended to them. There were, he said, gathered in friendly council, in the body of which he was President, representatives of fifteen nationalities and of eighteen different religious communions, and during the last two days in their sessions there had been not one word of discord or of strife. They were happy to think that the greatest interest of the British Empire, whose centre was in that city, was peace. Such peace they had enjoyed in their religious assembly, and had realised in international and fraternal intercourse. Such peace they trusted would ere long be the happy lot of all the nations of the earth. He offered the warmest thanks for the gracious hospitality offered to them that day.

Dr. Crothers, on behalf of those who came from other lands, added a few words of acknowledgment, and the Lord Mayor responding expressed his great interest in the particulars as to the International Council which he had just heard, and especially in their taking for watchword the name of Peace. He also shared in their aspiration after "goodwill and peace to all."

On Friday evening the social pleasures of the week were delightfully crowned by a reception given at the Grafton Galleries by Sir John and Lady Brunner on their own behalf and that of Sir Edwin and Lady Durning-Lawrence. The reception was very largely attended and greatly enjoyed, the beautiful rooms giving ample space, and the hospitality being unbounded.

SATURDAY, JUNE 1.

INTERNATIONAL COUNCIL BUSINESS MEETING.

Saturday is among Christian folk usually reckoned the end of a week, but this special week of our New Century festival began on a Saturday, and we must add to it at least another Sunday and Monday. Yet this day brought many regretful partings, for those to whom the grace of the railway companies set this limit, and whose duties called them home. But first came one more meeting at Essex Hall, the business meeting of the International Council, at which the Council Room was uncomfortably crowded, but for the sake of which a patient loyalty bore even that close and fervid heat.

At this meeting the chair was taken by the President, the Rev. J. E. Carpenter, at ten o'clock, and the Rev. C. W. Wendté, as Secretary, first read some letters of greeting to the Council, which had been received, and made a statement as to the widespread interest in its aims, shown by correspondents in many lands.

In addition to the greetings personally delivered by delegates from the various countries represented, letters had been received from Bishop Ferencz, on behalf of the Unitarian Churches of Hungary, from the German Protestantenverein, the Dutch Protestantenbond, and a number of individual Liberal leaders, who were unable to be present.

After the meeting the President received a letter from the President of the American Unitarian Association, with personal good wishes, and enclosing the following resolution unanimously passed at their annual meeting held on May 21:—

Resolved that the affectionate greetings of the Association be sent to the International Council about to convene in London, with the hope that the deliberations of the Council will promote sympathy and union among liberal thinkers and workers of diverse inheritance, experience, religious fellowship, and national allegiance.—Samuel A. Eliot, President.

Then followed a resolution, proposed by the President and seconded by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, offering warmest thanks to the representatives from foreign countries, who in many cases, at great personal inconvenience and sacrifice of time, had come to attend the meetings of the Council, and had so greatly strengthened it by their inspiration and support. Both speakers dwelt upon the unique experience of the week, for the members of our churches in this country in realising how they had part in a great world-wide movement, and on the remarkable unity of spirit which had been manifested.

The resolution was acknowledged by Professor Bonet-Maury, who, on behalf of the Foreign Delegates, very warmly reciprocated the expressions of thankfulness, and said that at Chicago, at the Congress of Religions in 1893, the dream had come to him that such a Pentecostal vision might be renewed, and in those meetings he felt that it had been renewed. To them, as French Huguenots, a minority in France, it was, he said, a great encouragement to be able to feel their unity with so compact and strong a body as the Unitarians of England. He added an expression of their special indebtedness to the President and Mr. Harwood, as representing the Hospitality Committee, who had done so much to ensure the happiness of their visit.

Signor Bracciforti also added a few fervent words expressing his faith in the future of Italy, and his gratitude for the kind and generous hospitality they had received.

A further resolution, moved by the President and seconded by the Rev. P. H. Hugenholtz, expressed the gratitude of the Council for the large attendance of representatives of societies and churches throughout the country, who had contributed so greatly to the success of the meetings. This was acknowledged by Mr. J. H. Brooks, of Wilmslow, who expressed his complete concurrence with what had been said as to the great helpfulness of the meetings, which it had been a great privilege to attend.

The Rev. W. Copeland Bowie then moved a resolution of the warmest acknowledgment and gratitude to all who had helped so earnestly and enthusiastically to prepare for those meetings and carry them through. He could not pretend that he had not worked himself, but often praise was concentrated on the wrong person and others were neglected. For many weeks past diligent hands and heads had been at work, preparing for all that they had now enjoyed. It was impossible to enumerate all who had rendered signal service, but he wished to bear grateful testimony to the unstinted devotion with which his two assistants had worked, rendering cheerful service far beyond what could have been expected of them. Seldom had meetings gone so well, and it was because all the workers, with self-forgetfulness, had aimed only at the best results and happiness for all. The best thanks to them, he was sure, would be the feeling that they had contributed something towards a movement, which would not only leave very pleasant memories, but was full of the truest and deepest inspiration for life and work.

The resolution was very cordially seconded by Professor Montet, of Geneva, and acknowledged by the Rev. J. Harwood, on behalf the Hospitality Committee and the other workers. The week had been memorable, he said, not only for the addresses which had been given, but for the listening. The earnest spirit which had been manifested by the great gathering in St. James's Hall had continued throughout the week, and looking at the audiences he had been struck by the expression of happiness on the sea of faces, which was most unusual in such gatherings! They had thankfully felt during the week that they still had trusted leaders, and could look forward with hope, feeling that their great work would be carried forward to success.

As to the Future.

Discussion as to the future led to the appointment of the following Executive Committee:—

The Revs. J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A., and W. Copeland Bowie, England.
The Revs. Samuel A. Eliot, D.D., and Charles W. Wendté, America.
Professor Jean Réville, Paris.
Professor E. Montet, D.D., Geneva.
Professor George Boros, D.D., Hungary.
Professor B. D. Eerdmans, D.D., Leiden.

To this Committee, to which Mr. Wendté would act as secretary, was entrusted the duty of arranging for the next meeting of the Council, and of appointing a president, who should belong to the country where the meeting was held. It was agreed that the next meeting should be held in September, 1903, and Holland and Switzerland were mentioned as the two most likely countries where the meeting might be held.

It was stated that on the previous evening Mr. Charles Jones had spoken to the President as to the publication in a volume of the Papers contributed to the present meeting of the Council, and as the difficulty of the expenses was thus overcome, the Revs. J. E. Carpenter, W. C. Bowie and J. Harwood were appointed a special publication Committee.

The subject of an International Review, which it was hoped might be established through the help of the Hibbert Trustees, was also mentioned, regretful reference being made to the cessation of the New World, and the following resolution, moved by the President and seconded by Professor Réville, was unanimously adopted:—

That this meeting learns with satisfaction that it is contemplated to establish an International periodical in aid of free Theological science and the principles of the Liberal Churches, and believes that such an organ may be of great service in the cause of truth, of liberty, and of religion.

The Secretary having made an appeal to members to bear the interests of the Council in mind, in the interval between their meetings, and to use every means, and particularly the press, to advance the cause, Professor Réville moved a vote of thanks to the President, which was seconded by Professor Eerdmans, supported by Miss Westenholz, and carried with acclamation. Mr. Carpenter's response brought the meeting and the public proceedings of the first gathering of the International Council to a close.

SUNDAY, JUNE 2.

We would gladly chronicle something of the spirit which we are assured found renewed expression in many services on this second Sunday of our great week, carrying to churches throughout the country a new inspiration of quickened faith and the great gladness which this Whitsuntide has brought to our people; but such a record is not to be put into words; it will grow silently from week to week in the unfolding of a richer ministry and an increasing measure of more faithful and more beneficent work.

Of our guests, it was pleasant to know that the voices of three of our American brethren were heard in London pulpits, Mr. Wendté preaching at Highgate, Mr. Wilson at Hampstead, and Dr. Crothers in the morning at Little Portland-street, and in the evening at Wandsworth. This chronicler, if it had been possible, would have been in three places at once; something of what he did here, to his great happiness and profit, may perhaps before long be offered to readers of THE INQUIRER.

MONDAY, JUNE 3.

The last day, which can be included in our week, on which the welcome hospitality of Manchester College was offered to our Foreign guests, must now be chronicled. The French Professors had already gone down to Oxford for the Sunday; Professor Montet had unfortunately been obliged to leave for the Continent, to attend the tercentenary celebrations at Montauban, on behalf of the University of Geneva; but most of the other guests, accompanied by Messrs. Harwood, Bowie, Tarrant, and another, travelled to Oxford on Monday morning in a special carriage, and thus, under the pleasantest conditions, could enjoy the country of the Thames Valley, which they saw in its early summer glory, while the first approach to the University city was only less beautiful than the last glimpse which the returning visitors had of it in the lovely evening light. The party was met at Oxford by the President of the International Council, and visits were paid before lunch to Christ Church and Merton, and afterwards to Magdalen, Balliol, and other colleges. Later in the afternoon a reception was held in the library of Manchester College by the Principal and lecturers, when among the guests who came to meet our guests were the Master of Balliol, the Principal of Jesus, Canon Cheyne, Canon Driver, Professors Tylor, Dicey, Earle, and Percy Gardner, the Revs. A. J. Carlyle, Buchanan Gray, Vernon Bartlett, and Thatcher, Messrs. F. C. Conybeare, and P. E. Matheson. There could have been no pleasanter conclusion of a most delightful week.

For now we must acknowledge that the week is ended, and we have bidden farewell to our guests, who have become our friends. To France, to Holland, to Germany, to Switzerland, to Italy they have returned, or are on their way. Hungary and Denmark will also soon receive their own again. Mr. Wendté has crossed over to the Continent on international business, and we trust also for some rest and refreshment after his hard work; Dr. Crothers, it will be remembered, is to preach at Oxford in Manchester College Chapel on Sunday morning, and then he too is bound for the Continent, for Italy and Switzerland, until on August 10, he sails by a Leyland boat from Liverpool for Boston. Mr. Wendté will sail from Bremen, and will not return to England on his way home.

Ah, well! the week is ended, and most happily. It has given us new friends, and many treasures of the deeper life. We have still much to look forward to in the rich store of papers which it has left with us, while of its delightful memories and of the good fruits that it must bear we do not fear that there will be any end.

IMPRESSIONS OF WHIT-WEEK.

I.

WITH respect to the series of New Century Meetings recently held, my impression is that—whether considered in regard to the numbers attending, the interest manifested, or the spirit everywhere pervading—they may be accurately described as the most remarkable ever known in this country in connection with our Unitarian form of thought and life.

There appeared to be a general rejoicing at the return to the dear old Sunday-school Breakfast, and the speeches made, as well as the papers read, were of a very high order indeed. The meeting of the Postal Mission was of a quieter kind, but substantial evidence was given of good work being done in a variety of ways, not the least of which, I think, may be said to be what it has done and is doing in the restoration of decaying causes up and down the country.

The Communion service was a fitting preparation for the great service in St. James's Hall; although it was feared by many that it would be too much of a rush from one meeting to the other, the time allowed being so very limited.

The vast congregation that assembled in St. James's Hall—the poetic and spiritual eloquence of the preacher, the grand chorus of praise—made us all feel that it was good to be there, and an uplifting influence to experience the power of our faith when given a rich and full expression.

The annual meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association was of an unusually interesting and practical character, occupying as that body did the chief position in the organisation of the present New Century Meetings, with all their multifarions activities. The speakers were of a representative order, and kept well within reasonable limits in their remarks.

The great work of the Secretary, done in such an admirable way, was enthusiastically honoured as it well deserved to be on such an occasion.

Of the International Meetings I can only say that they seemed a natural continuance of the other gatherings, and of a very delightful coming together of Unitarians and Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers from all parts of the world.

The speakers for the most part were wise in their use of time, and the papers read were well up-to-date in their matter and spirit.

Perhaps I may say that there appeared to be something wanting in order to complete the provision made for all sorts and conditions of men, and that was a great gathering of our young people, of the "rally" kind found to be so attractive and successful amongst the Christian Endeavour Societies, and other similar institutions in England and America.

But one thing was plainly to be seen in the midst of it all—and that was the seriousness of tone—the spirit of determination to do all that could be done to bring us more into touch with our life and work.

What our churches need in order to make greater progress everywhere is a deepening of the religious life, with a more earnest expression of it—and greater enthusiasm in religious worship and religious work, "the one thing needful" to make our faith a power for good.

The Christian World says:—

The sight of the crowded rooms suggests the query whether if Unitarians are so numerous, they might not do more than they seem to do in this busy world.

Much, very much, remains to be done, if we are to take our proper place in the front rank of the life and effort of to-day. And I do hope and believe that these meetings—which have been, in one way or another, an outward and visible sign of happy days and helpful deeds, of earnest talk and quiet thought—will bring about such a result that every one who loves his place of worship, or cares for his religious principles, will do his utmost to help on the greatest possible success.

Derby, June 3. John Birks.

II.

Certainly the Whitsuntide gathering of this year has been remarkable for large attendance and generous hospitality. We have not often been met with the news that "no more tickets can be issued," "the hall is full," "there is standing room only," as on many occasions this Whit-week; and it is not merely the kindness of particularly gracious hostesses during the brief intervals between meetings which makes me record the impression of notable hospitality.

It was the assembly of the International Council, however, which made this Whitsuntide memorable to me and many others. To come face to face with men who are leading the way to religious freedom in many lands, from many varying orthodoxies, to hear them speak, sometimes with great command of our own language, sometimes in slightly broken English, sometimes in a tongue more familiar to them than to us, gave a reality of impression which would not be gathered from their writings; and being thus brought together, we realised how much there is in common, how among very varying forms of persecution or difficulty or encouragement, they have had an inward history bringing them towards the same religion of immediate, unconstrained communion with God.

Without disparaging any, recognising that all were useful and many excellent contributions to knowledge and fellowship, I choose out as reaching me with especial force the utterances at the International Council of Tchertkoff, Tolstoy's friend, and Mr. Wicksteed. The acclamation with which Tolstoy's name was received and, subsequently, the deep impression made by his exponent, are to be taken as evidence that Unitarians as well as other people are deeply touched by the Christian message of the greatest known living teacher. The appeal is not to self-interest; it does not make things easy at the outset; but it is effective, for it reaches the deep places of the soul, and is real and spiritual and practical. If we do not agree with everything Tolstoy says, he has got hold of us, and we must, as honest men, reckon with his influence and test its truth, or else as dishonest refuse the light.

More clear insight into the significance of Wordsworth I have never met, than in Mr. Wicksteed's address. There were sentences which went to the heart of the matter, and which to those who knew Wordsworth were keen and vivid with meaning. Could two men be more different in nature, training, and method than Tolstoy and Wordsworth? Yet we see here as elsewhere that all inspiration and sincerity are closely akin, and bring men to the unity which the effort to impose a common name or concurrence of expression retards.

Among much that is encouraging and helpful there is a certain want of faith among us which we share with most religious organisations. We are afraid to take counsel together on the most vital matters of immediate interest in our national affairs. A meeting privately called gave expression to the deep feeling of a large proportion of our people on the subject of the war; but we did not dare to hold conference together as part of our recognised proceedings. We differ; but could we not consider together the application of the acknowledged Christian postulates to our national life and the condition of our people? It was perhaps prudent, or even necessary, to avoid such subjects, lest heat and partisanship should annul the usefulness of our assemblies. But if this be so, it is a serious subject for thought that it should be so. I never cared for scoring points in argument against an opponent even in a debating society, and have long outgrown the overpowering desire to see my side lording it over another; and surely a Christian assembly ought to have outgrown that view of debate. In the presence of grave evils, which surely every religious man or woman must deplore—I dare not summarise them: the agonies of South Africa and of England are too severe to be lightly strung together—whether we judge them inevitable or avoidable, have we no word, dare we not even speak together of these things, lest we quarrel? About the saddest inference to be drawn from our own and other May meetings of this year is that until they are practically agreed, and therefore the usefulness of brotherly discussion is minimised, followers of Christ are afraid to confer on practical questions of national righteousness and duty or the condition of the people who lie under the wheel of progress. This is following Christ afar off. "The servant of the Lord must not strive"; but without personal animosity or party passion, he must seek the truth; and where, if not among those who acknowledge the obligations of the gospel of human and divine love, shall we find those who will take sweet counsel together to lift the fallen, to do justice to all, and to guide the feet of the nations and our own feet into the way of peace and love? "I believe in the Holy Catholic Church." In Dr. Crothers' address our meetings reached their high-water mark, and at these words the crest of the topmost wave broke in light.

I was impressed by the vastness of the gatherings, by their unanimity, by their cordiality which amounted to a positive affection. It was surely not my fault but that of the "common consciousness" that I rushed up to a lady foreign delegate and without any introduction enthusiastically shook hands with her—and she did not seem in the least embarrassed!

For the first time in my life I was impressed by the cohesiveness of our people. It seemed to me that my former notion that we were an agglomeration of irreconcileable units was false and I felt that One Purpose, One Life, and One Spirit breathed through us all fusing our mass into a veritable Catholic Unity. I noticed, too, the silence of the small man. The cranky rebel, who imagines that the only way to vindicate "the right and duty of individual judgment" is to talk nonsense on every occasion and raise a dust, because as a little child—he was seen and not heard. Once, indeed, a gentleman in the audience made heroic efforts to tell us he had visited the colonies—but let that pass!

For this splendid discipline we have to thank the organisers who had laid the rails with astonishing skill and foresight. . . . I also noticed a new and significant element—the unconscious recognition of a true authority. A strong man in the chair and strong men supporting him gave us something solid to lean upon. We trusted in them as in a true "authority"—the authority of science, of scholarship, of an incorruptible integrity of character.

> It fortifies my soul to know
> That though I perish, Truth is so,
> That howsoe'er I stray and range,
> Whate'er I do, Thou dost not change.
> I steadier step when I recall
> That if I slip Thou dost not fall.

No one fussed or fretted. The humble said in his heart "I will keep silence and work, for the far destinies of our movement are safe in the hands of these men. These are my generals, let them command, I will obey." That was a new impression. It amounted to a conviction that Unitarians had finished sowing their wild oats and were steadying down to legitimate agriculture. We felt proud—and in this pride was a true meekness of humility—that we belonged to something larger than distinctive Unitarianism, proud, too, of our possession of great men to whose untiring vigilance we could trust the present and future of the Liberal Faith all the world over.

It is difficult to speak of individual papers when all were good and many excellent, but I think that the two addresses which stand out most conspicuously in my memory are those of Dr. Crothers and Mr. Graham Wallas. During Mr. Vladimir Tchertkoff's address one felt strangely fascinated by the dramatic contrast between the personality and the utterance. To see and hear this man, once a soldier and an Imperial Guardsman, in stature a giant, with a leonine head poised on massive shoulders, a warrior every inch of him, born to govern and command, the mere glance of whose eye might pierce and slay, mildly pleading for the Sermon on the Mount, a Tolstoy and not a Nietzsche, was something never to be forgotten.

It is not possible to sum up the multitudinous complexity of one's impressions, but the greatest and strongest conviction that I carried away with me can be expressed only in that starry sentence with which I began, "I believe in the Holy Catholic Church." With Channing I had long ago agreed, but I now realised with a new solemnity that "there is a grander church than all particular ones, however extensive—the Church Catholic or Universal, spread over all lands and one with the Church in heaven. . . . No man can be excommunicated from it but by himself, by the death of goodness in his own breast."

Our Cause is destined to a great Future. It is even now numerically stronger than we know: it is still stronger in the men and women who have the honour to work for it: it is strongest of all in its purpose, and in its prophecy for the days to come.

For my part, I felt that the New Reformation long prayed for, long delayed, had at last broken upon the world in the might of a New Pentecost with powerful champions and apostles speeding through all parts of the world—a Reformation sincere even to sternness in the integrity of its ideals, and conscious that the Breath of the Eternal Righteousness inspires it in all its work. I knew that ours is a great Church, the greatest and most glorious of all, a true Catholicism which can seize and possess the imagination, impel and drive the will and even force the whole man upon his knees before God in prayer that He may speed and prosper and bless it with what under His Providence must be a victorious and all-conquering career.

MINISTER'S SUPERANNUATION FUND.

ON Tuesday, May 28, 1901, a well-attended meeting was held at Essex Hall, to consider this subject. The meeting had been convened by the Committee appointed at the National Conference at Leicester, 1900, to carry out the scheme adopted on that occasion.

The Rev. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, President of the Conference, occupied the chair, and called on Mr. J. Cogan Conway, Secretary of the Committee, to read his report embodying a letter recently received from Mr. F. G. P. Neison, the eminent actuarial authority.

Mr. CONWAY'S report explained that the Committee had submitted to Mr. Neison a suggestion that the scheme of assisted insurances in the Equitable Life insurance office (the plan recommended at Leicester) should be set aside, and that the Fund itself should do its own insurance, receiving the premiums and paying the amounts as they fell due, thus taking all the risks involved. Mr. Neison, in reply, had very decidedly deprecated the new suggestion as exposed to considerable danger from the small number of insurers, even if it could be adopted at all under the present laws dealing with the subject. On the other hand, he reported that the terms of insurance suggested by the Equitable Life Assurance Society, which were brought before the Conference at Leicester, were extremely advantageous; while the high character of that office gave the utmost security to insurers. His letter ends:—"In conclusion, after careful consideration of the whole matter, I am firmly of opinion that it would be wiser for your Committee to adhere to the principle of contracting with a Life Office as set out in their report, than to attempt founding an independent organisation for dealing with the risk."

Professor CARPENTER said the report just read implied a history, the details of which were perhaps not fresh in the minds of all present, and he would endeavour briefly to explain the present position. The subject was first brought before the Conference at Sheffield in 1897, where Mr. Conway read a paper on the subject. A Committee was then appointed to consider the matter, and especially to inquire whether there was a need of a new Fund, in view of the existence of the Widows' Fund and the Ministers' Benevolent Society. As regards the former, it was limited to ministers connected with the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire, and it was not able at present to enroll nearly all of them within its benefit. The Ministers' Benevolent Society, on the other hand, had a much wider scope, and its administration at Birmingham was very ably conducted and commanded entire confidence. The Committee had consulted with the directors, and were met with perfect courtesy and goodwill; but the Society was found to be established upon lines which excluded that principle of insurance, conferring a right upon insurers, which was thought to be necessary. Under these circumstances the Committee reported at Leicester in favour of the raising of a new Superannuation Fund. The general plan upon which this fund was to be administered was this: from the resources derived from investments and annual subscriptions half the premium required to secure an annuity of £52 at the age of sixty-five would be paid, with this proviso, that not more than £10 annually would be contributed by the Fund toward the premium of any one insurer. That scheme, with several varieties as to additional benefits, had been approved by the Conference, and entrusted to a special Committee separate from the General Committee of the Conference. The first step of this body was to reopen negotiations with the Ministers' Benevolent Society with a view of avoiding any unnecessary multiplying of agencies engaged in similar work. It was of course obvious that the new proposals could in no way infringe upon the trusts under which the existing funds of the Society were so faithfully administered by the Directors. But suppose the Conference could raise the needed amount, would it be possible for the managers of the Benevolent Society to take on the insurance scheme as an independent and separate branch of their good work? For this there was at hand an encouraging analogy. Fifteen years ago a fund was created within the Church of England on lines similar to those of the Ministers' Benevolent Society—i.e., for making grants to disabled clergy. But by degrees, the desirability of an insurance scheme was seen, and in 1892 this was added, by the incorporation of the Clergy Pensions Institute. This Society now has its representatives in every diocese through the country, and has already raised a very large capital. It has two branches, one of ordinary insurance and one of benevolent aid. Under its provisions a clergyman may insure for a pension of fifteen guineas annually, or any multiple of that sum. In the meanwhile, the benevolent wing continues to give charitable help to ministers requiring it. After friendly correspondence on different forms of co-operation in this matter, a deputation from the Conference Committee met the directors of the Ministers' Benevolent Society in Birmingham last December and laid this proposal before them; but after a long and most friendly discussion the directors came to the conclusion that they could not adopt the plan, their own work being so distinctly established on lines of free benevolence, and an insurance scheme not being in the scope of their constitution. The Committee were therefore thrown back on the necessity of creating a fresh administrative body; but here also, as the audience had learned, an alternative had been presented. The Rev. J. C. Street had urged with great ability that the new fund should do its own insurance; and the Committee had submitted his scheme to Mr. Neison with the result which they had already heard. Mr. Carpenter then read a letter from Mr. J. R. Beard in support of the Committee's plan, in which he said: "As one who has some practical knowledge of the principles of assurance, I can agree with almost every line of Mr. Neison's report, and especially in his view that we could not expect a sufficient number of assurers to afford an assurable average, and that the expenses on so small a number of risks would be altogether disproportionate." Although the idea was in many ways very attractive, the Committee had felt it wisest to abandon it. The position therefore was this:—The Conference had emphatically affirmed the necessity for the provision of superannuation pensions for aged ministers; the wisest guidance had been sought in order to avoid multiplying boards and societies; and there was only one clear duty left, and that was to appeal to the congregations of the Conference to give effect to the Conference's decision. He would remind them that the Independents had now a Pastors' Retiring Fund of £135,000. The Clergy Pensions Institute had already accumulated capital which produced an income of £40,000. Were we to lag behind? The existing funds could not supply the need. The scheme upon which the Superannuation Fund would be based, would create a claim and confer a right, and by so doing would greatly strengthen the security of the ministry as to their future. It had been thought in some directions that there would not be a sufficiently large number of ministers to render such a scheme necessary; but Mr. David Martineau, to whom the Committee were deeply indebted for his untiring interest and his business skill, had estimated that probably about fifty-seven ministers might join at once; and when the replies to circulars of inquiry came in, affirmative answers were actually received from fifty-six. As time went on, every year would bring more young men into the ministry, and the number would no doubt increase. In conclusion, Professor Carpenter said, the need is a very real and urgent one. As a minister himself, whose life had been freed from that burden which pressed so heavily on others, the burden of anxiety for their own future and that of those whom they loved best, he earnestly commended this cause to the churches. He had seen enough of the strain thus imposed, a strain which inevitably marred the efficiency of a man's work. Often the necessity of getting a living led men to remain in the active ministry when it would be much better for themselves and their congregations that they should retire. This principle was recognised in all Government service, and it was daily winning more and more acceptance. The Committee asked for a capital sum of £20,000, with an additional income from subscriptions of £300 a year; and if those who could not contribute large sums would contribute their guineas he was confident the whole could be raised. Let it not be said that the sum was too great. It was nineteen years since Conference had asked for similar help, and then a Sustentation Fund of £20,000, with an annual subscription list besides, was given in response. The erection of Manchester College at Oxford had shown the same generous spirit; and at Manchester and London large sums had been raised recently for local church extension. But these last were local efforts; could not the whole country raise what was now being asked for, and could they not secure sufficient resources to enable them to begin operations in January, 1903? The Fund was not only one that was worthy of the support of the churches; he would almost say it was due to the ministers. At the outset of the new century, he believed, there was no enterprise likely to be more invigorating, encouraging, and helpful to ministers, and, through them, more beneficial to the life of the congregations than the creation of a Ministers' Superannuation Fund. (Applause).

Mr. DAVID MARTINEAU gave some particulars of the inquiries on which the estimate of the sums needed was obtained, and of the types of insurance (with or without added bonuses, &c.) which would be available. He said the successful raising of the funds of the Clergy Pension Institute had been accomplished by diligent canvas, not only of Churchmen, but many others. They must go round and whip up their friends, and face the task like men. What Manchester and London had done locally the whole country could more than equal. The eloquent appeal of Professor Carpenter would be felt everywhere, and he trusted it would stimulate a ready response.

Sir JOHN T. BRUNNER (President B. and F.U.A.), after asking some questions on the scheme, moved the following resolution:—

That this meeting, believing that the establishment of a Ministers' Superannuation Fund is a matter of vital importance for the welfare both of ministers and congregations, earnestly commends to the churches constituting the National Conference the scheme now presented by the Committee on the basis adopted at Leicester in April, 1900.

No words of his were required to commend such a scheme. Those who had read the report and Mr. Conway's conference paper on the subject must be fully convinced that for the benefit alike of the congregations, the ministers, and the faith we hold in common, this scheme is of vital importance.

The Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL (President of the Widows' Fund), in seconding the motion, drew special attention to the impossibility of ministers, for the most part, making any provision for their later years; while (he added, amid laughter) it was a fact that our ministers exceed the average ministry in length of years. There was a movement to raise the standard of efficiency in the ministers; it was surely incumbent on them to give them the measure of security and freedom from anxiety which this Fund would impart to those who insured under its provisions and by its help.

Mr. W. LONG (President of the Sustentation Fund) said he felt it was a right to claim an annuity which would be secured by insurance under the new scheme, and that was exactly what the ministers should have. He willingly accepted the result of the Committee's labours, especially as corroborated by a gentleman of such great financial experience as Sir John Brunner, and he should be very glad to assist in his own district in raising contributions to the Fund.

Mr. W. COLFOX (President of Manchester College, Oxford) said they should acknowledge the debt of gratitude due to Mr. Conway for his persistent advocacy of this idea of superannuation. He would only wish to point out that care must be taken not to pledge assistance to a greater number of ministers than the funds would allow. He heartily supported the motion.

Mr. GROSVENOR TALBOT (President of the Yorkshire Union) said the object was in one way a selfish one for the congregations, for the better the minister's work—and it would be better if they were relieved of so large a measure of anxiety—the better would be the condition of the churches. He sincerely commended the project.

A brief conversation followed on the details of the scheme, and the Rev. J. C. STREET took the opportunity to say that, although it was his suggestion that the Fund should be its own insurance office, he fully acknowledged Mr. Neison's authority on the subject, and would for his part loyally support the scheme now before them.

Mr. W. BLAKE ODGERS, K.C., as the son of a minister who never during the first forty years of his ministry had received a stipend approaching to £200 a year, heartily commended the Fund. It was in the nature of "deferred pay" to help these insurances. It was not eleemosynary, nor purely "benevolent." He looked upon the scheme with unqualified approval.

The resolution was then carried unanimously, and the meeting separated.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE GUILDS UNION.

INAUGURAL MEETING.

A MEETING to decide on the constitution to be adopted for the National Conference Guilds Union was held at Little Portland-street Chapel, in the afternoon of Thursday, May 30, the Rev. Joseph Wood, of the Old Meeting, Birmingham, in the chair.

The Rev. JOHN ELLIS (Sheffield) explained that the meeting was the outcome of suggestions made at the Leicester Conference. It was then thought desirable to bring about, if possible, the federation of existing societies as a basis of a National Union of young people's religious organisations. A sub-committee was formed, which drew up a draft constitution, which it was proposed to ask that meeting to sanction. Letters were sent to all the existing Guilds or Unions, asking if they would be willing to join the proposed National Conference Guilds Union, and about thirty had responded. The objects of the Union should be—

(1) To promote the formation of Guilds in connection with the churches on the roll of the National Conference, which shall aim at uniting the young people together with the various workers of our congregations and schools into a League of Fellowship to (a) foster the religious life, and (b) inspire personal service. (2) To promote the efficiency of Guilds as factors in religious work and worship by means of a common manual, literature, meetings, conferences, and any other methods which from time to time may be adopted.

Mr. Ellis said that the aims and objects of existing societies bearing various names were about the same, and on behalf of the Committee expressed the opinion that it would be good to form a Union of such societies holding close connection with the National Conference, and that the Union when formed should pursue an earnest advocacy of the Guild idea. As the movement spread he looked forward to the formation of local or district Unions, so that all young people over about fifteen might come under the influence of the Guild movement.

The Rev. JOSEPH WOOD, in moving the first resolution, said that the Guild movement in our churches had justified itself by its usefulness and remarkable success, and it had come to stay. Guilds had sprung up, not as the result of concerted action on the part of the central organisation, but because the thing was in the air. It was thought the leakage between the school and the church would be to a great extent stopped by this means. Endless discussions and meetings had taken place in all churches to discover how to remedy this state of affairs. It was significant that about twenty years ago, when the Guild was first started in the Congregational churches in this country, a similar movement was begun in America by the Congregationalists, who formed the Christian Endeavour Society, which had prospered more than any English movement, and had given rise to a large number of societies known as the "Hand in Hand" Societies, "King's Daughters," "King's Sons," &c., all having the same objects. The success of this movement was due to the distinctly religious basis and the scope it gave for the energies of the young people. The Guilds have always contemplated bringing the young folks themselves to share in the management and conduct of the meetings, to make them feel that it was their society, and they were responsible for its welfare and success. They all contemplated two things—the continuation of the religious education of the young and the training of the young in social work, labours of love, and brotherliness. It was said at first they were creating a church within the church, and making the young sacramentarians, if they had Communion services for them; but these objections had melted away before the experience of the good accomplished. It was because of the wide spread of these institutions that they thought the time had come to bring them into closer union for mutual help.

The Rev. H. Gow (Leicester), in seconding the motion, said that it was very necessary that the young people should acquire the habit of expression. They wanted to help them to think and express themselves, so that when necessary they could plainly state their beliefs, and help one another to know what is in their hearts. It was most impressive to hear those young men and women say out, sometimes powerfully and simply exactly what they had been thinking. He had been surprised to hear some of the speeches by Guild members.

After discussion, the draft constitution drawn up by the sub-committee was adopted, with the exception of clause 8 as to the conditions under which the constitution might be altered. With regard to the suggested age limit of fifteen, which some objected to, it was pointed out that Junior Guilds could be formed for children under that age, but they would be debarred from voting at the annual meeting.

The Rev. C. W. WENDTÉ (Boston, Mass.) gave an interesting account of the movement in America. He said that the organisation of the young people on behalf of the ethical and religious life come from America. In 1881 was formed the first Christian Endeavour Society, and now there are 60,000 societies, with nearly 4,000,000 members. They themselves had about 150 organisations in the United States for religious union of the young people, and he described one of these. The young people come together once a week or so for religious exercises, addresses, and discussions. Occasionally they take the Sunday evening service entirely out of his hands, and he as minister sits in a back seat, taking no part unless specially asked. In addition to this the members go to the slums, bring the children out and give them a day in the country, and have a good social life, often entertaining their elders. In the Sunday-school they are a great force, about two-thirds of the teachers having come out of the Union. The movement gives the young people an opportunity to express their religion in an active way. Mr. Wendté then read the following message from the Religious Union of America, which he had been delegated to convey to that meeting:—

The young people of the Religious Union of America wish to extend to the young people of England, who have just established a National organisation, the best wishes for the success of the new Society, and to offer anything that might help to advance the movement. In America the result of such organisation has been found helpful and encouraging, and it is sincerely hoped in England also the young people will feel their increased usefulness in aiding the religious cause.

On the motion of the CHAIRMAN, it was decided to authorise Mr. Ellis (who sailed for New York last Wednesday) to convey to the Young People's Religious Union of America the heartiest greeting, and thanks for the message to us, and hopes for their success.

The Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE (Leeds) moved, and the Rev. J. J. WRIGHT (Atherton) seconded, the appointment of officers as follows:—

President: the Rev. J. Wood; Vice-President: the Rev. Chas. Hargrove, M.A.; Secretary: the Rev. J. Ellis; Treasurer: Mr. H. P. Greg; Council: the Revs. W. G. Tarrant, B.A., E. D. P. Evans, H. Gow, B.A., J. J. Wright, W. H. Drummond, B.A., Miss Florence Hill, Miss Edith Gittins, Mr. Ion Pritchard, and Mr. F. Talbot, leaving three members to be co-opted by the Council.

The Rev. S. M. CROTHERS, D.D. (Cambridge, Mass.), said he came to that meeting because he had great interest in the work for young people, and believed that the Guild could be of great service. He concluded with the greeting of the American churches, and his appreciation of the religious earnestness he had seen in England.

Correspondents are requested to note that to be sure of insertion the same week, news must reach the Office by the first post on Thursday at latest, and the earlier in the week the better.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

You all of you like receiving presents, and you know how glad you are when your father brings you a present home on your birthday. Perhaps he had been thinking over it for a long time, and perhaps he had been saving up so that it might be a good one. But, now think how God is always making us presents. On my table a few weeks ago was a small bunch of beautiful white flowers. They were given me by a young friend, but they were first given by God, and they were also a present from Him. It was He who made them, made them so beautiful to gladden me. And one morning when I looked at them I said: "God has been saving up to make me a present of them." God "saving up"! That is a strange idea. Yes, but God does save up. He is the best "saver-up" in the whole world. He has taken care of the earth in which the little flower grew, and of the little seed from which it sprang. He has protected it from cold by covering it with the snow, refreshed it with the rain, and warmed it into fulness by the sun. And as the result of all this saving up, I had a bunch of snowdrops. It makes me very glad when I think that God has so much love for us and gives us such beautiful gifts.

The earth is God's wonderful treasure-box. In it are many beautiful things for you and me. As the weeks pass you see more and more of them. He brings out of it flowers of all kinds — daisies, geraniums, lilies, and roses. He brings out of it wheat and apples, plums and cherries, pears and strawberries, and many other fruits; and He makes presents of them to us.

And some things He has been saving up for thousands of years to give to us. There was the coal which has warmed us through the long winter, the brick and the stone out of which our houses are made, and the iron out of which our knives are wrought. So you see God saves up in a very wonderful way, and we ought to be very grateful for all that He gives us.

Now, perhaps, you see that God is near to us, and has been thinking of us, and providing for us always—ages before we were born. We ought to love Him in return, and show our love by living good lives. If we could always remember that He is near, seeing what we do and hearing what we say, we should never do or say anything wrong. But we forget about Him, though He never forgets about us. When we are going to do evil He whispers to us, "Do not do that," and when we are prompted to do a kind deed He says, quite plainly, "Do it." And although we hear the voice we do not always remember that it is God's. But when we think about it, we know that it comes from God.

> His that gentle voice we hear
> Soft as breath of even,
> That checks each fault and calms each fear,
> And speaks of heaven.

If then you are tempted to strike another in anger or to do anything that is wrong, recollect that God is near and He sees what you are doing.

We are always glad and free from care when we feel that God is on our side. Many years ago a man preached to the Arabs that there was only one God. The chief people, however, believed that there were many gods, and fell down to worship idols. They, therefore, resolved to put the preacher to death, but he escaped and fled for his life with a friend. Soon these two saw the horsemen pursuing them, and hid in a cave. As the clatter of the horses' hoofs sounded nearer and nearer, the friend became afraid, and said, "If they find us, we are only two against so many." But the preacher answered, "Nay, friend, we are three, for God is with us." As the horsemen sped past without noticing them, the friend thought on this saying.

God is with us—always near to us! Perhaps you think He is listening when you say your prayers. But do you ever think that He hears when you utter evil and quarrelsome words? He does. And I think it must pain Him when we thus put our tongues to an evil use. And I am sure when you believe that He loves you as I have told you He does that you would do anything rather than grieve Him. In the New Testament you will read that there is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth. And there is also sorrow and sadness in heaven whenever one of God's children goes astray.

As you grow older you will have a great many difficult things to learn and remember. But the most important thing that you will ever have to learn and remember, you can learn now. It is that God is your heavenly Father, that He loves you, sees you and hears you. And it will be your chief duty to live as in His sight. May God help you to do this all your earthly days and at last receive you into His heaven.

PRAYER AND SONG.

"LORD, we would trust thee, serve thee, unafraid . . ."
And as the preacher pray'd,
A jocund blackbird piped his mellow tune
Full-heartedly, as blackbirds pipe in June;
Till prayer and bird-song, jubilantly blended,
Caught up our souls to heaven.
At last they ended;
And going, full of patience, from the church,
I saw the minstrel on his perch
Amid the elm-boughs. Once again he sang,
And in my heart that wordless music rang,
A pæan of rejoicing life and love.

Such things persuade our thoughts to leap above
The trammels of a worldly sophistry;
And give them scope, and will not let them die.

"Trust thee, serve thee unafraid . . ."
Then as the preacher pray'd,
We heard the blackbird's note
Shrill from its pulsing throat;
And in that minute all we knew
Seem'd nothing, but the Holy Spirit drew
Nigh unto us: and children of the sod,
Earth-beings, limited, had speech with God.

IN ONE SPIRIT.

IN our present issue we have completed the chronicle of Whit-week, which tells of a remarkable series of meetings, and of high hopes more than realised in the first gathering of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers.

For ourselves, members of Free Churches in this country, it has been a great delight and stimulus to be together in such numbers, for worship and for counsel, and in the happiest spirit of brotherly fellowship. We have no remembrance of meetings more admirably arranged, more efficiently carried through, so completely filled with what was good and helpful and inspiring, and in which speakers kept so exactly to their allotted time. It was a triumph of good management or of some hidden virtue, which it is astonishing to look back upon, but which adds no little to the full satisfaction and the happy memories of the week.

What must have been very widely felt with regard to the meetings of the International Council was expressed by the PRESIDENT at the closing business meeting on Saturday morning, when he said:—"We have had a week of unique and solemn joy, a week quite without parallel in my experience, in the way it has made us feel that we here in England are in touch with a larger movement of thought and of religion, which in reality is pervading the great civilised nations of the world." We have never before felt in our little country churches, he added, that we belonged to a great current of thought and emotion, which was making itself felt in many lands, expressing itself in all kinds of movements; and it was a happy thing that the International Council was able to gather up those streams of thought, so that we can feel our unity all the world over.

At the same meeting the Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG also expressed his sense of the depth of the new emotion which the past week had brought, marking an event unique not only in their own experience but in history. They were so often told, he said, that they were outside the great movements of thought and of religious life, but now they found themselves in touch with a world movement of the highest elements of humanity; and this came to them with an emotion of the utmost joy and triumph. What was most remarkable was that without any pre-arrangement representatives of nearly all the civilised nations of the world had given expression to the same sentiments, almost in the same words, with a delightful monotony. They were thinking the same thoughts, worshipping the same God, feeling the pulse of the same humanity.

Later in the same meeting, Mr. J. HOWARD BROOKS, speaking as a layman, bore similar testimony to the inspiration and delight which he had found in the meetings, and recalled a saying of BALDWIN BROWN'S, which he applied to the experience of the past week: "We have toiled in the narrows too long, we must spread our sails and go out into the ocean." That, he said, they were now prepared to do, and must hope that with favouring breezes they would reach the shore for which they were bound.

These are testimonies which might be many times multiplied, to the deep impression made by the meetings of the International Council, and we must record with great thankfulness that our visitors from other countries, both in public and in private, gave very warm expression not only to the pleasure which they had derived from these meetings and the cordial hospitality extended to them, but also to the help and encouragement they had derived from such close and brotherly fellowship with members of other churches, of like mind with their own. We are accustomed to think of our churches as often set in isolated places, at difficult posts of duty; but it seems that our liberal Protestant brethren, especially those whose work lies in Roman Catholic countries feel their isolation as keenly, if not more keenly than we do, and we are happy to think that in this matter we can give as well as receive, for mutual encouragement, for the confirming of faith, the vindication of a true spiritual freedom throughout the world, and the deepening of our common life in the one Spirit.

INTERNATIONAL COUNCIL OF UNITARIAN & OTHER LIBERAL RELIGIOUS THINKERS AND WORKERS.

THE SYMPATHY OF RELIGIONS

BY THE REV. S. M. CROTHERS, D.D.*

ONE of the old Roman deities to whom many altars and temples were erected was the god Terminus—the god of boundaries; and it was characteristic of the old thought of the way in which the boundaries between nations and between individuals were established that the god Terminus was pictured as a deity without arms and without feet. There he stood immovable, representing something that could never change. That is the ancient idea of the distinction between races and persons and religions. That is the idea which we have in the old Hebrew Psalms, of the way in which God gave the sea its decree, and said: "Thus far shalt thou go and no further." The ancient idea was of a world of fixed divisions—a finished world for good or for evil.

The world that opens up to the modern man is altogether different from this—not the world of fixed divisions, not the world where the god Terminus stands immovable, but the world of power. Every atom becomes to the modern mind a centre of force. Every creature is pushing out in every direction, full of aspiration, full of desires, with impulses of its own. Everywhere these forces are at work—great material forces building the world and destroying the world; moral forces, spiritual forces, intellectual forces. In the true sense to-day, we must say, as our fathers said: Force rules the world, has ruled it—shall rule it. The fundamental question is not how beautiful a thing is, how rational an arrangement it is, but how forceful it is. The question which comes to us as we look upon the future of civilisation is as to the amount of force which makes for righteousness, which may make for a better civilisation.

Has our religion decayed? Has our civilisation dropped back? Are good men nerveless, or is there a great influx of courage and of faith and aspiration in the world? That is a question which comes to us, and makes all questions of tradition indifferent to us, and it is from that stand-point that I wish to speak to you. It is not an academic question, but one of personal interest to everyone of us. We see everywhere the new power which man has discovered—the mighty force of combination, industrial, social, political, the great new Imperialism. The little things are pushed to the wall; the great strong things are again asserting themselves. The day of petty thought is past, and now we stand as those who love not merely our own nations, or our own churches, but as those who are interested in the welfare of the world. When we are confronted by the mighty combinations of selfishness and greed, when we see what designing men can do by using the great forces of the world for their own selfish ends, we ask if there are spiritual forces equally great, nay greater? Away with our pettiness and our littleness! The great word of religion to-day is the word not of Protestantism, it is the word of Catholicity, a world-wide thing, a mighty triumphant thing; and we as Liberals need to give up once for all the idea that we are standing for "the dissidence of dissent," and to take our place manfully as leaders in that Catholicism, vaster in its sweep and more practical than that what Hildebrand ever dreamt of. The great word of the ancient creed given to us Liberals, and given to us because we are Liberals, is: "We believe in the Holy Catholic Church." We believe in the Church universal, and we work for the Church universal.

* An Address given to the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers, at Essex Hall, on Thursday, May 30.

Now what does that mean? I was given the title to my address this morning of "The Sympathy of Religions"; but the phrase may be misleading. "The Sympathy of Religions!" As if there were one religion over here, and another religion over there, and that they ought to tolerate one another and sympathise with one another. That is not it. The biologist does not talk of different lives as if they had different laws. What he is interested in is the development of life; one life from the beginning, manifesting itself through a thousand forms, and yet under the control of one law. And what we stand for on this platform, men of different creeds, with different antecedents, is not a mere eclecticism. That is the weakest thing that was ever thought of. Carlyle quotes Novalis, "Every eclectic is at heart a sceptic." A man who does not believe in anything finds it easy to tolerate everything. It is like that which some times passes for cosmopolitanism. A man travels round the world, a good-natured spectator, without any sense of responsibility. That is not cosmopolitanism. Such a man is "a citizen of the world," he is not a citizen of anything. He is not at home anywhere. A true cosmopolitan is a patriot, with his love of country, with his love for home and kindred enlarged and purified. It is because I love my own country that I love England and Italy and Germany. It is because my heart thrills with the story of liberty in my own country that I know that there is the same emotion which men all round the world have felt. And so it is with religion.

In one of the platonic dialogues Socrates asks a man a searching question:—"What is virtue?" And the man begins a rambling talk on the subject, and Socrates says:—"I asked you what virtue is, and you tell me 'Oh, there are a great many different kinds of virtue.'" And so, when I ask a man "What is religion?" and he begins to tell me that there are a great many different kinds of religion, I come to the conclusion that he does not know what any religion is. Religion is something that a man is loyal to; ready to die for and live for; the highest force; the holiest thing he knows; his aspirations after the Infinite and the perfect. Shall we treat religion as a conventional thing; a temporary thing; something which is peculiar to one country—or shall we treat it as a great elemental divine power, the power of God in human life? When we find a person in my country who is a pretty good person, we say that he has a New England conscience. We often imagine that we invented conscience, but we find that your conscience is very much the same kind of conscience that ours is. Now we come back to the fundamental idea of religion, and I think the man who has a religious impulse in himself has the key for the interpretation of the whole history of humanity in all generations. There is nothing foreign, nothing strange. It is simply human nature, weak and imperfect, striving upward, under the circumstances of its own age, with the traditions that happen to be around it, toward the ideal perfection, which is the good of all our endeavour.

Do you ask me whether I understand Buddhism? I do not understand the thing, I do not understand the circumstances of the people, but I begin by taking for granted that a Buddhist is a human being. Do you say, "How strange it is that a person should long for Nirvana—for the cessation of conscious thought? Does that seem to be strange to you? It does not seem to be strange to me, because I have been tired a good many times, and that is the way we all of us feel when we are tired; when we think of the great injustices in the world; when we see the millions around us starving, and see the hopelessness of the struggle through life! If a great weariness were upon us, and we were parched with thirst, and one should come to us, proclaiming in the name of the Eternal—rest and peace, "blessed Master," every one of us would say, "Our Saviour, our Light." Only now and then do we of the Western world feel that, but the only key to it, the only interpretation of it, lies in the religion within us.

Each one of us has some time been young, and we know the impulses which stir in the youthful heart—strong, hopeful. The world is all before us, and the great words then which we emphasise are the words of freedom, independence. It is then joy enough to live our own life, to be free to cut loose from the past. Then the great words from all the ages, of the great strong souls, men of eternal youth and strength, come to us. We know then what Luther meant, what Latimer felt, what the great pioneers meant; we know what Paul meant in his joy in a new life. We rejoice in all these words. Many come from a thousand sources, and from many lands; but they touch us. Then we grow older. We are disappointed. We are sick. We see the dreams of youth perhaps fade away. A great homesickness comes, and we stand afraid of the future, knowing not what it may bring to us. Then the great words of Conservatism come to us. We know then why men build temples to which they may retire; why they set aside in this busy world, some sacred place. We know what Thomas à Kempis meant in "The Imitation of Christ." We know what the old stoics meant when, in an alien world, in a world against which they individually rebelled, they sought calmness and strength, and like strong men armed, kept their houses, not knowing when a stronger than they might come upon them. There are times when everyone of us must know what pessimism means—the great ideal that seems not for us to be realised—a pure soul in an alien world. You go back to the old Persian poet, and you read again and understand:—

Oh Love, could you and I with him conspire
To grasp this sorry scheme of things entire,
Would we not shatter it to bits, and then
Remould it nearer to our hearts' desire?

There are moods when we know what Agnosticism means. There are times when we are utterly crushed down, and then we understand as never before the words of the ancient Psalmist:—"All thy waves and billows have gone over us." Is there any mood which the human soul has ever felt which does not sometimes thrill the sensitive heart to-day? Then we realise that amid all these outward differences there is unity—one ceaseless aspiration after the perfect, by men who, themselves, are imperfect; a struggle for liberty on the part of men who are only half free.

And now I want to speak of what seems to me is to be the practical thing in this sympathy of religions. It is an easy thing and a cheap thing to sympathise with the religion of people we never meet. I have the greatest ease in sympathising with a Zoroastrian, or an esoteric Buddhist, but when it comes to some little High Church curate, that is a little harder, because there is a good deal of human nature in all of us. The practical outcome of it all is, that we shall indeed sympathise with that High Church curate, and with the Wesleyan evangelist, and even sympathise with people who have a different kind of Unitarianism from our own. We must come to the point where we are habitually emphasising the great things and the true things.

I want to emphasise in what I have to say, that that which seems to me to be one of the keys of the situation, is to give up altogether the idea that long ago religion was being made, that the religion that we have to-day is less vital and less imbued with the primitive instincts and hopes of men than that in some far-off age. As you stand at the base of a mountain you see perhaps a cloud hanging on the summit. It seems to you as if the little cloud has drifted across the sky, and is "shepherded by the slow, unwilling wind." But as you approach you find that the wind is keen, and you see the hurrying particles of the mist. You ask why does not the wind drive the cloud away. Then you come to see that you are in the great laboratory of the sky, where the clouds are being made. From the lowlands the winds are sweeping up, trying to storm the mountains, forcing upward the moisture-laden air. Just as they reach the summit the burden they have carried becomes visible. The wind is ever driving the particles away, the wind ever forming there the cloud. Now so it is with all the heights of human life. They are always shrouded in mystery. The winds do not dissipate it, they create it. Courage, love, devotion are lifted up to the heights. Behold there the ever-present mystery of godliness. All life is touched at last by something which we cannot understand. The whole life of man, all his civilisation, all his knowledge, all his achievements, are borne along by eternal forces and reach at length to that great mystery wherein the thought of that which is highest in man blends insensibly with religion and with worship.

THE PUBLIC MEETING.

ON Thursday evening, May 30, a public meeting was held in the Westminster Town Hall, with an overflow meeting in the Council Chamber, at both of which speeches were made, as recorded in our "Chronicle." Here we give the complete text of two of the speeches, and a full report of a third.

THE SPIRITUAL FACTOR OF LIFE AND MODERN MATERIALISM.

The Rev. Dr. DRUMMOND spoke as follows:—Materialism, as a philosophical hypothesis, cannot be regarded as a serious force, or one dangerous to religion, at the present day. Some thirty years ago it raised its voice with a triumphant note, and men, who are so often misled by words, forgetting that evolution was a process and not a power, believed that the particles of matter contained in themselves the "promise and potency" of the highest moral and intellectual attainments. But human reason declines to rest in this conception, and to believe that the mere mechanical movement of atoms is the ultimate reality of things. In spite, however, of this recovery of tone there is still an air of sadness breathing through the religion of our time, and faith goes about asking wistfully for a home from which the clouds have been lifted, and where the Spirit shines down with unimpeded and gladdening ray; and this is certainly due in part to the enormous advance which has been made in our knowledge of the material universe.

In the first place, the well-grounded belief that physical law has prevailed through all time, and reaches through all space, at least wherever matter is to be found, produces in many minds a curious illusion of thought. Though it is not sufficient to sustain a reasoned materialism, yet there is an uneasy feeling that law has taken the place of God, and that wherever the man of science can prove the existence of a fixed order of phenomena, there the operation of God can no longer be assumed; and men eagerly grope for some break in the physical chain, where God must demonstrably have interposed with an exercise of miraculous power. But a law, which is only a general statement of a constant order of events, explains nothing; and order is surely a sign of the presence, not of the absence, of mind. The illusion is due partly to the influence of habit, which removes our sense of wonder and mystery in contemplating that which we constantly experience, and partly to the remnants of an imperfect theology, which taught us to look for the signs of God's presence in miracle, and to view the marvellous processes of the natural world as undivine. This shadow will pass away from our minds when we come to regard matter as an expression of spirit, and each beauteous form and ordered sequence as a manifestation of divine thought.

This suggests a second source of the present misgivings. Science and theology have often entered into sharp antagonism; and whenever they have done so, science has come off victorious. Beliefs, which at one time were supposed to rest on the direct testimony of God Himself, have crumbled away, one after another, before the advance of knowledge, and the very basis on which Christian theology was supposed to be founded has been utterly and irretrievably shattered. It is a natural effect on the imagination to conceive of this assault as carried up to the last resorts of faith, and to think of the glorious edifice of worship as sinking into ruins before the batteries of all-conquering intellect. But here, again, we are the victims of illusion. What science has demolished is not the spiritual truth which it is the proper task of theology to interpret, but the imperfect science of early ages which had become attached to theology, but is no part of its permanent structure. Science is supreme in the domain of outward facts, and is perfectly competent to set aside the vague conjectures of primeval man; but it cannot intrude into the unseen temple where the soul holds communion with God, and it will be found, when the scaffolding is pulled down, that that pure temple will stand forth, like some grand cathedral, in all its magnificent proportions, relieved of a frame-work which concealed its beauty, and weakened the power of its impression.

But there is another kind of materialism which is perhaps, at the present day, a far deeper and more potent cause of unbelief—an unbelief which is not theoretical, but practical; I mean the devotion of men's thought and effort to the accumulation of material wealth, which is greatly stimulated by the enormous increase in our power of commanding the resources of Nature. A pulpit platitude! you will exclaim; but platitude or no platitude, it is true, and this worship of worldly riches is one of the most terrible dangers that confront us. It is the canker that has slowly eaten away the heart of mighty nations; and who will say that it has not already laid its blight upon Christendom, teaching men that their life does consist in the abundance of the things that they possess, and that the greatness of nations is to be measured by the reach of their grasping avarice, and by their power of destroying, not of helping and ennobling their brethren? Yet it is not wealth, but the idolatry of wealth, that corrodes the heart. Wealth, acquired by honourable and unselfish toil, is a needed basis of civilisation, and may be employed for holy and spiritual ends. But he who is most fully aware of this is also conscious of the subtle danger which riches bring, how they dazzle and flatter whatever is selfish in him, and tempt him to set his heart upon them; and his only resource against these evils is to accept his wealth as a trust from the hand of God, and to use it with a solemn sense of responsibility as the guardian and administrator of a divine gift. Many a grand soul has thus risen upon the tide of fortune, and still remembered that his treasure was not in gold and jewels, but in a spirit linked to the Spirit of God, in lofty and disinterested thought, in spotless honour, and in a lowly and consecrated heart. Society, however, is composed of average people; and can we deny that, when wealth and luxury have come in like a flood, the hearts of many are led astray, false and vulgar ideals obtain a pernicious power, and the banner of faith is draggled in the dust?

If we turn now to the other side of our subject, the spiritual factor of life, our great question is—which is higher, and sees farther into the truth of things, the merely intellectual and prudent man, who deals only with the order of phenomena, and lives only for limited and earthly ends, or the spiritual man, who believes that he is in contact with a transcendent Reality which abides through all changes, and who lives by the light of an ideal holiness?

In answer to this question let us observe, in the first place, that spiritual life is a reality, a formative power dwelling deep within the hearts of saints, and not wholly absent from those who deny its postulates, or even from those who are unconscious of its existence. Even in the lowest and the meanest are there not sparks of heavenly light that flicker across the dark abyss, soft echoes of a diviner world that are sometimes heard when the clamours of earth are still? But in what multitudes has this life within their life been an acknowledged power, a Spirit bearing witness with their spirits that they were children of God, an ideal alluring them to other worlds, a calm upon the restless heart, brooding over it with a sweet purity and love. This life is the life of God in the soul of man; for, if gravitation manifests the ultimate power that underlies the universe, no less certainly holiness, justice, and love manifest, or rather are, the eternal Spirit abiding in us, and revealing themselves as the deep things of God. And if in most of us this life does not dwell with such overpowering fulness, yet, when we see it in others, our hearts bound with affection and reverence, and, while we gratefully lay our garlands at the feet of saints, we recognise in them the true pattern of humanity. And indeed, if we reflect, we shall see that, in spite of all our faults, the spiritual has so interpenetrated our thoughts and ways that it is difficult for us to imagine what life would be if it were wholly withdrawn; if we were tied down to hard material fact; if admiration, reverence, and worship lay dead within us, and the long struggle of mankind for righteousness, for the coming of a Kingdom of God, for the manifestation of His sons, appeared to us only as the mocking dream of fools. Even when we are least spiritual the heavenly voice still speaks to us, when we are most sinful we are conscious of the higher Will whose laws we are transgressing. And if our hearts are too impure to reflect God's perfect image, still His light flashes on their troubled waves, and makes us yearn for holy calm, when all the storms of self will be laid to sleep, and we shall see Him as He is.

It is this hidden life of the soul on which, in modern times, we must place our chief reliance as an evidence of the truths of religion. Formerly there was a tendency among Christian apologists to run down this kind of appeal, and to dwell upon the dark abyss of absurdity in the unassisted human mind, in order to show the necessity for Christ, and, as it was thought, to enhance his glory. Far be it from me to say a word that could diminish the glory of that transcendent soul, whose spirit is so deeply needed to heal the sickness of the world, and to tame the pride, the avarice, and the savagery of nations. But spiritual things must be spiritually discerned; and not only has the old apparatus of miracle and testimony lost its power of convincing the intellect, but we have come to see that true religion must rest on far other foundations, and that intellect alone, however complete its proofs, is powerless to create that faith in which the soul lies open towards God to receive a rill of His infinite life. It is the function of the intellect to interpret, to formulate, to co-ordinate the different realms of knowledge, not to create; and in religion it must draw its data from the deep wells of the spirit. Even to the human Christ we cannot be brought by way of the discursive understanding, however welcome the light which may thus be thrown upon the circumstances of his lot. The inward and essential man cannot be discovered by the shrewdest wit. "The Lord is the Spirit"; and no man can come to him unless the Father draw him. But when, through this divine attraction, we are drawn so near to him that we look with direct gaze upon the glory that encircles him, we ask no other evidence—we believe and know that this is the eternal life, the life which alone redeems men from slavery to the perishing forms of falsehood and sin, and constitutes the true end of their being.

This private experience throws a new light upon the course of history. Instead of seeing a godless mass of blind and stupid heathenism, we perceive that a divine Word has been present through all the world's groaning and travailing, slowly evolving the highest human attributes, drawing men on, through all their devious wanderings, through all their lapses and failures, still ever on towards the consummate perfection of their nature. It was not that the silence of eternity might be startled by a momentary voice from heaven, not that there might be a sudden revelation of that of which philosopher had never thought, or poet dreamed, or prophet spoken, not to make an irruption, as it were, of Deity into an undivine realm, that Christ came, but to fulfil the age-long promise whispered in the heart of man, those vaticinations of a glory to be revealed which have never been silent since first man bent the knee in prayer. And so we listen not only to the private oracles in our own breast, but to a great volume of attestation coming from all climes and ages, proclaiming that the tabernacle of God is with men, and that he has never left himself without a witness.

It is, then, the Divinity within us that draws us to Christ; and unless we believed in God, and believed in Him spiritually, as One in whom we live and move, who speaks to our hearts and answers our prayers, we could not believe in Christ. And nevertheless it is true that, when we believe in him, a flood of light is shed upon many a dim experience from the richness and fulness of that gracious life, and his advent marked a creative epoch in the religion of the world. He was no mere reformer, calling men back to the purity of ancient days, but fused together into a new and living organism the scattered elements of faith, and called on men to rise into that divine sonship which alone could realise the formative thought of God, and give a final answer to the secret aspirations of the human heart. And so it is through fellowship with himself, through the infusion of the same spirit, through our entrance into the same deep, interior life, that he in his turn brings us to the Father who has led us to him, and thereby completely interprets the long divine process which has been educating mankind, and gives us at last perfect rest and peace in the submission of our wills to the Will of God, not through the reluctant obedience of duty, but through the holy self-sacrifice and communion of love.

And now let us ask, in conclusion—If these things are true, what is the proper work of liberal theologians? It is surely something far higher and nobler than promulgating a system of negation. It is, indeed, well to be mighty in pulling down the strongholds of error; but if we could only strew the ground with ruins, ours were a thankless task. It is for us to revive the drooping fires of faith, and, when we have removed the obstructions that have spread themselves between the soul and God, to lead men deeper into that spiritual life which has breathed through all the Christian ages, and found a home in every Christian Church. We need a new reformation—not so much a reconstruction of theology, as a rekindling of religion in its originality and power, a deepening of the Christ-life in the heart of mankind. We must proclaim grander social and national ideals, and, in the midst of a mocking and unbelieving generation, labour, still undaunted, for the Kingdom of God. Christ is being crucified daily in his own Christendom; and men wag their heads at him, saying, Lord, Lord, while they flout and despise his teaching. But still his life abides, the only eternal life. May it come quickly, and establish the fraternity of man, the reign of justice and of love.

"THE UNITARIAN MESSAGE AND MISSION."

The Rev. S. M. Crothers said that a distinguished American lecturer once said that it did not hurt his feelings very much when some one said, "What a remarkably poor lecture"; but he was discouraged when, on going out of the room, people wondered why anybody lectured at all. He thought that was the way one felt with regard to churches. It was not so bad when people said this or that church was very poor, or very narrow, or imperfect, as when they asked why there should be any church. If they were to have a consciousness of their mission as Unitarians, they must have a new sense of the value and meaning of the church. By the church he meant all churches. In the churches they must have a new sense of the meaning and necessity of religious organisation. It seemed to him as if two of the greatest achievements of mankind in the way of organisation were the State, with the establishment of justice and law by which the ordinary business of life might be managed; and then the conception of the organisation of the spiritual life. It seemed as though men had said, "We have organised justice, commerce, and philanthropy. Now let us organise and promulgate kindness; let us organise spirituality; let us organise the soul."

What was it that the Church meant and aspired to be? Shortly before leaving America he happened to read a paper which he occasionally took up, and which was the organ of the English Catholics—The Tablet—and there he saw an account of a speech which had been delivered by a priest on the establishment of a new Catholic Church in one of the great cities. As he read what the priest said to his people, he said: "There is sincerely nothing there that I cannot assent to." The priest had said that the people were lonely, and the Catholic Church had come to give them fellowship and friendliness; they were ignorant, and they came to tell them the best they knew about life; they came to help the poor, to help the needy; they came to build up that life, to come to their hearts. And he said to himself "That is what I believe. This church is the very greatest thing man could have. I want to belong to the church." Now, what was a church? It was not a mere debating society, a philosophical club; its value was measured by its actual relation to the interests of the people. With respect to the church he was willing to confess that his first desire—and he thought he was justified in it—was to belong to the biggest church; to the strongest church there was; to the most ancient church there is; that is to say, to the biggest, strongest, and most ancient church which would admit him without telling a lie. "The Spirit and the Church say come, and whosoever heareth let him come and drink of the water of life freely. And who so will let him come." He stood at the door of the ancient church, and said, "I will; I want to live that kind of life; I want to join in prayer; I want to join in helpfulness to my fellow-men; I want to comfort others with spiritual kindness." He sympathised with one of the old women in an American novel who gave as her rule of life: "While you get, get a plenty." Well, while he was getting religion he wanted to get plenty, so he stood before the door of the Catholic Church and said, "Give me your invitation and I will do your work; I will grasp your hand, and share your fellowship. May I come? Have you room for me standing as I am?" The Church said, "Come, give me thy heart—come." And he said, "Who may come?" And it was replied, "Whoever will may come, but of course you must accept certain things. You must believe in the Holy Father the Pope; the infallibility of many things; you must accept our ritual; you must believe in the miracles you can never test, and in a great many things of which all the witnesses are dead. Whosoever can do all that may come." He turned away and said, "Your invitation is not for me. You shut your doors against me when in all sincerity I come."

He turned away and went to the great historic Protestant Church, and found in that so much that he loved, so much that taught him in the spirit; so many beautiful things; such a companionship. He wanted to come to that. He knew the good works which were being done; he knew what truth, manhood and womanhood lay there. He said, "I hear the invitation, might I come just as I am to share in that work and life? And they said to him, no longer arrogantly, but sadly, "Come, but you must repeat certain words which are set down. They may not be to your mind exactly true, but your forefathers believed them to be true, why cannot you repeat them still? You must take a certain attitude towards modern things, you must walk carefully in the faith. Faith is very brittle, and it must be carefully preserved. Come Come! with us, repeat the words and come." He asked, "Can I come as I am, thinking as I do?" He might enter if he preferred to give up that which was more sacred than human fellowship or outward activity. And as he stood there he saw the gates shut against him. He could not come as he was.

Now, was not there, in this great modern world, room for a church which would give new energy to the old work for the good of men, and yet a church into which one might enter with absolute freedom that he might drink "the water of life"? The building of such a church, to live for it, to work for it, to brighten it in every way, as though it was something which demanded all their energy and all their ambition—that was what appealed to them. Not to believe this or that doctrine, but to get a church which should be a church for the modern worker. Did they know that the great thing which had happened in this modern world of theirs had been a dawning upon men's minds of a new virtue—the virtue of veracity? Men had long talked about truth, they had long gone after the truth, there had been "defenders" of what was called the truth, but never in their own day had they seen man dedicate himself to truth-seeking — just as in some old temple priests were dedicated to a deity and to the sacrifice of a deity. This was what modern conscience had done: it had built up in the minds of men the virtue of veracity. One of the most searching addresses to the Church and clergy of which he knew, was that given in an essay by Professor Sidgewick, on "Clerical Ethics," and it asked whether it was possible—he asked as a man of science, without any predisposition to answer it one way or another—whether a man could be a clergyman, and have before him the same standard of veracity which was taken for granted in the man of science? That was a pretty searching question, and he did not say they had attained to it yet. There still lingered prejudices and preconceptions which had to them the stale odours of the centuries gone by. But the Unitarian Church had not performed its mission, and had not done its work in the world, until it gave an opportunity to men of speaking freely their uttermost minds, following truth to its ultimate consequences. "Like a mighty army moves the Church of God," and in the forefront of that army, separated though, sometimes like the scout from the main body, but still belonging to it, in the front of this great army must march those who in religion must not merely answer to the needs of the weak, to the lowly, the suffering and ignorant, but must answer to the need of the bold, courageous, and truth-seeking men who were the pioneers of their faith.

The time was past when they must apologise, and think of their church as a refuge into which men could creep. It was not that. Their faith and religion were an opportunity for service that in the future would call—as never before—for their strongest, bravest efforts; they would ask no favour of Church, or priesthood, they asked "only the wages of going on."

THE MISSION OF LIBERAL PROTESTANTS AMONG CATHOLIC PEOPLES.

Professor JEAN RÉVILLE spoke as follows:—According to the request of the Council of these meetings, I wish to offer here a few general considerations on the mission of liberal Protestantism amidst the Roman Catholic peoples. I say general considerations, because it is quite impossible to fix exactly such a mission. The conditions in which Protestants may exercise their influence are very different according to the different countries or social classes. It is indeed a serious mistake to suppose that one may use the same method for the religious education of men of different races, different instruction and different hereditary intellectual constitution. The relative failure of the Christian missions, I mean the immense disproportion we observe between the charges assumed and the results obtained, proves evidently how defective is this method.

Amidst people still tightly bound to the Roman Catholic faith, and whose spiritual development is not yet sufficient, it is impossible to make any serious liberal Protestant propaganda. They do not and cannot understand, no more than you could teach algebra to some one who could not do a simple multiplication or division sum. You cannot imagine what strange ideas are prevalent about Protestants in certain countries where they are not known and where priests, sincere but ignorant, teach about them the most stupendous legends. Protestant and atheist is here the same thing, and, according to the strict Catholic faith, all Protestants are considered as excommunicated—that is, condemned to damnation and to the eternal sufferings of hell.

In such a society a liberal Protestant may not hope to gain any souls to his free and enlightened religious faith. Those he speaks to can appreciate neither light nor liberty. He must here concentrate all his pains and zeal upon social emancipation or instructive enterprises, apart from religious organisations, diffusing historical and scientific knowledge that may prove the absurdity of the traditional Catholic teaching. He must try to change the intellectual condition of these men, and so prepare an appropriate ground where a free and conscious religious faith may later on grow and ripen. Protestantism can really have some influence only on Catholics already emancipated from the authority and faith of their own church, and we are taught by experience that in the countries where there is no powerful Protestant competition, the two most active agents of this emancipation are secular schools and democracy. But it is not enough for a Catholic to emancipate himself from his own church, to become a Protestant. In Catholic countries of advanced instruction and high civilisation, there is a great number of these emancipated souls (especially amongst men). An important majority of them become Freethinkers as a natural consequence of their Catholic breeding. They were taught in their childhood that there is no other religion than Christianity, that Christianity and Catholicism are identical, that besides the Catholic Church no church has any right to call itself Christian. So, when they arrive at the conviction that the Catholic doctrine and the authority of the Catholic Church are irreconcilable with the modern spirit and modern science, they naturally must conclude that they are no more Christians, and can no longer profess any positive religion. Consequently they are ill-affected towards Protestantism, and do not even take the pains of studying it. Nevertheless most of these Freethinkers are not irreligious men; most of them believe in God, and many in a future life. The best amongst them, for whom liberty has not degenerated into licence, cherish a moral ideal. Why, then, does such a small number come to Protestantism?

It is not only because the Protestant service, especially the Calvinist, seems to them too rigid, too unæsthetic, I might say too tedious; for they could adhere to a Protestant church without being constrained to a regular attendance at all its services. It is chiefly because Protestantism seems to them an incomplete and somewhat misbegotten solution of the religious problem, because they feel displeased with its biblicism and dogmatism, because it appears often to them as a simple imitation of the Catholic authority devoid of its beauty and majesty. They say it is not worth the while, having shaken off the Papal yoke and the priest's servitude, to fall into passive obedience to a book or to a group of theologians who show themselves as intolerant in their chapels as Catholics do in their cathedrals. It is amongst these men that liberal Protestantism has a double mission to accomplish, indirect by instruction, direct by diffusion of its faith—a free, tolerant, broad faith, independent of the traditional dogmatic, but thoroughly imbued with the generous spirit of the prophets and of the gospel.

How often I have heard emancipated Catholics say after a holy service conducted by a liberal clergyman, such as at marriages and funerals, "This is the religion that I can agree to." Unhappily such impressions are often superficial. Many other considerations withhold them from adhering to a Protestant church—material interests, family influences, especially of women who are still bound to Catholicism. And when these impressions are more serious, when these men are desirous to know somewhat more about Protestantism, they soon find out that most of the Protestants are orthodox, exceedingly divided, separated by sectarian ideas and confessional rivalries, which are not at all edifying. Therefore why should they expose themselves to all the trouble and social grievances caused by a conversion to Protestantism in a Catholic country? They think it much better to remain as they are, with their individual convictions, especially as the Catholic Church, in all countries where her authority is contested, is extremely accommodating about opinions as long as you do not renounce her exterior ceremonies in the most important circumstances of life.

Here we must exert our personal influence, and try to show that the only sure method to preserve themselves from Catholic influences in the future, and to secure spiritual liberty for themselves and for their family, is to adhere to a liberal Protestant church and to give to their children a liberal Protestant education, instead of leaving the children without religious instruction or with a Catholic instruction that they will be taught by their own parents to despise. But the mission of liberal Protestantism does not consist only in recruiting new members for the Unitarian—or, as we call them on the Continent, for the Modern or Liberal churches. We must also, and in Catholic countries I should say chiefly, be the leaven in the social paste, inspire ever and ever new instructive, educative and reformative enterprises, so as to call even not Protestant people to a high moral level, to spiritual life, to a holy passion for justice and truth, to the untrammelled love of God and of their brethren—that is, as Jesus said himself, to all the Law and the Prophets. The liberal Protestant must not be only the man of a chapel; he must be the man of the Spirit. Like our Saviour, we must sow boldly and plenteously. The Lord Almighty will allow the seed to grow and the harvest to ripen, for liberal Protestantism is the real religion of the modern age. There are already and there will be evermore in the world many, many Unitarians who are not members of the Unitarian churches.

THE INNER MISSION AMONG ROMAN CATHOLIC PEOPLE OF THE PROTESTANT SCHOOLS OF DIVINITY.

BY PROFESSOR BONET-MAURY, OF PARIS.*

MY colleague, Professor Jean Réville, spoke to you yesterday evening about the urgent need of an inner mission amidst our Roman Catholic people in France, and pointed out the special message which we liberal Protestants have for them. Perhaps these questions occurred to your mind, while you were listening to his address: "Whence will the men for that work be taken?" and "Where can able preachers for that mission be trained?" I should like to answer both questions in a few words.

I. The answer to the first is easy to give. The best men to deliver the Protestant message to Roman Catholics are Roman Catholic laymen, or even priests, who have become earnest and learned liberal Protestants.

The first reason is because they know from their own, and generally bitter, experience the way which leads from the land of servitude to the sacred and joyous freedom of conscience. Were not the leaders of the Reformation monks such as Luther and Vermigli, or priests like Calvin and Zwingli? Another reason is that they will speak a language more intelligible to their former co-religionists; though, to be sure, they will not use that "Canaan dialect" of which my friend, the Rev. E. Fontanès, gave so ridiculous an example yesterday. About twelve years ago a most significant movement began among the Roman Catholic clergymen, carrying scores of the best men out of the Church of Rome, since they could no longer endure the yoke of infallible Popery. Since that time twelve priests or monks come every year to the Montauban, or Paris Faculty of Theology, asking for advice, begging to be admitted as students; and some of them have become most capable and liberal preachers of the Gospel.

And now let us come to the second question: Where would these agents of the inner missions be trained? I answer, in our Protestant Schools of Divinity.

The Huguenots, our forefathers, laid much stress on their colleges and academies. The first of all was established at Geneva by John Calvin. You know his word to some churches of the Saintonge asking for ministers, "Send us wood, and we shall send you back arrows." Since they had secured the recognition of their public worship and self-government by Henry IV.'s Edict of Nantes, they established scores of colleges and no less than six academies or universities, especially for the training of their ministers, at Montauban, Saumur, Sedan, Die, Montpellier, and Orthez. Of these only two—Geneva and Montauban—survived the abolition of Protestant worship by Louis XIV. Another was quite recently established at Paris, in 1877, to replace that of Strassburg, of which we had been deprived by the conquest of Alsace. It is noteworthy that our schools of Divinity are supported by the French Republic, whilst the old Sorbonne and the four other Roman Catholic Faculties of Theology have been abolished. Moreover, the Geneva school, although belonging to Switzerland, undertakes the training of the future ministers of the Protestant congregations of France.

As for their relation to dogma, it is remarkable that only one of the Faculties was willing to subscribe to the orthodox Creed of the Synod of 1872; neither the Geneva nor the Paris Faculty would place themselves under the yoke of any Confession of Faith.

Here are some figures, in order to give you an idea of the importance of these schools. Geneva has six lectureships, with 50 students. The majority of the professors are non-subscribers, or so-called liberals. This school, which has endowments from the old Huguenots, gives scholarships, even to students of our Faculty of Paris, to go to Germany in order to complete their theological studies. Montauban has 7 lectureships, and about 75 students, belonging for the most part to orthodoxy. It will celebrate on June 4 next the tercentenary jubilee of its foundation. Paris has 10 lectureships, 6 ordinary professors, and 4 so-called Maîtres de Conférences, with about 65 students. The half of the professors are Lutheran, the other half Presbyterian. The majority has a liberal bent. This result is chiefly due to our late dean Auguste Sabatier. Educated in the strictest orthodoxy, he had come out nearly an Unitarian, by his effort to reconcile perfect liberty in Biblical researches with faithfulness to the apostolic Gospel. His conception of the dogmas as dissolving and revolving symbols of the Christian faith has been expounded in a masterly manner in his "Sketch of a Philosophy of Religion."

He was not only a prominent divine, but a brilliant literary writer and a godlike and good man. As Dean he succeeded in making with all of us professors at the Paris Faculty, most divers in our views, a family of brethren, devoted to the same object—the service of Christ in mankind. Although dead, he still speaks to us. We will keep to his principle, which was to train our students in reverence to God and His prophets, but in perfect freedom towards the letter of the Bible.

I cannot better explain to you the method of our liberal professors than by borrowing from R. L. Stevenson the following words:—

> As honest men, whatever we teach, be it good or evil, it is not the doctrine of Christ. What he taught was not a code of rules, but a ruling Spirit; not truths, but a spirit of truth; not views, but a view. What he showed us was an attitude of mind.

Now that is exactly what we try to make of our students: men imbued not with dogmatic formulæ, but with Christ's spirit, and devoted to the progress of the Kingdom of God upon earth.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

OUR report of the annual meetings of the Sunday-School Association, the Temperance Association, and the Central Postal Mission, chronicled last week, we are obliged still to hold over, but hope to complete them all next week. The new interest of the International Council, appealing directly to readers in many lands, appeared to us this year to be paramount, but although delayed we trust that the reports of those other meetings will be as valuable and as welcome as ever.

THE Mill Hill Pulpit for June contains a Unitarian sermon for Trinity Sunday, "Reasons for Disbelief," by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, M.A. As an appendix is printed "A Psalm for Public Worship," dated December, 1876. The following are the concluding passages of the sermon:—

"Who are these that so darken the counsel of God by words without knowlege? and whose is the presumption? Ours who hold by the Catholic Faith, the Faith of Jew and Gentile before the Trinity was heard of, the Faith of Jesus who taught us to pray not to Three in One but to One Father, the Faith which reason approves and revelation confirms? Or theirs rather who insist upon a puzzle which they cannot prove by reason or by revelation, and introduce human relationships and number and person into the ineffable Godhead?

"But if it be a question of Reverence, ours is the greater who do not dare to draw near to define the nature of the Almighty—or if Authority be appealed to, it is on our side, for neither the word Trinity nor the Idea is to be found till long after Jesus and his Apostles are dead, and the Bible written and closed. And if pride of reason be alleged as the motive of our denial, we shall reply that the pride is theirs who dare intrude into the Holy of Holies and search out the mystery of Supreme and Absolute Being, and draw up propositions to define the constitution of the Godhead, and condemn as impious all who cannot accept them.

"Ours is the ancient, ours the truly Catholic Faith, faith of Moses and of Christ, faith of poets and philosophers of all the ages, faith as Tertullian showed long ago of the human soul—soul of the heathen "simple, rude, uncultured, untaught, which unconsciously bore witness to the one God, above and supreme over all its idols.

"Ours to bear witness, an insignificant minority though we be at present and for long to come. Ours to wait patiently till Christendom turn again and confess with Job—'Yea I have spoken of that which I understood not, things too wonderful for me which I knew not,' and we unite at length in one mighty world-wide chorus, learnt of Israel, 'Hear, O all ye children of men, the Lord our God is one Lord.'"

THROUGH the generous co-operation of some friends of Prince Kropotkin, we are to have within the next few days a popular edition of his interesting and highly suggestive work, "Fields, Factories, and Workshops," hitherto available only to those who could afford 12s. The book is valuable as a study of the rural problem, as well as of the general economic tendencies and such special questions as technical education and British commercial development; and it is purely with the aim of getting it read far and wide among the more serious class of working men that it is now to be re-issued through Swan Sonnenschein at 1s. in paper and 2s. in cloth.

DR. WARSCHAUER'S two articles on "Christianity, the Religion of the Incarnation," which recently appeared in these columns, have been reprinted, in pamphlet form, and may be had for 2d. from Mr. Philip Green, 5, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

MANY of our readers will be interested to hear that the Rev. Dr. G. Dawes Hicks, minister of Unity Church, Islington, was on Monday last elected Vice-President of the Aristotelian Society, in place of Professor Sully, resigned. We congratulate Dr. Hicks on the honour of his appointment.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Atherton: Chowbent.—Following his usual custom, the Rev. J. J. Wright gave his congregation on Sunday morning and evening last an account of the Twentieth Century and International meetings held in London during the previous week. Ten representatives of the Atherton congregation, school, and other societies had been present at the meetings. On Sunday afternoon Mr. Wright also gave to the whole school, between the singing of suitable hymns, such glimpses of the places and proceedings as were likely to interest teachers and scholars. He called special attention to the new "Code Book." This custom, which, we believe, is also followed in other places, must tend to keep and cultivate the interest of congregations and schools in the aims and work of the general body. The speaker also urged his hearers to get the denominational papers and read the fuller accounts of the meetings, for which their appetite is whetted by a talk about the good things.

Horsham.—The 128th Whitsuntide anniversary was celebrated on Sunday week, when, though the attendance was somewhat small, the usual pleasant reunion was held. Divine service was conducted by the Rev. Gardner Preston, of Hastings, both morning and evening; communion service followed the morning service. An interesting meeting was held in the afternoon, when the chair was taken by Mr. S. C. Burgess, of Crawley, and addresses were delivered by the Revs. E. S. Lang Buckland, J. J. Marten, G. Lansdowne; Mr. Edwin Ellis and Mr. Tarring. Members of the choir gave musical selections at intervals. Collections taken on behalf of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and the Provincial Assembly realised slightly over £4. Just about the time the earlier services of the day were being held, one, who during all her early life had worshipped in the little meeting-house, and who, during some of her maturer years, had attended the worship conducted by the minister of the day, at Hastings, passed away, leaving the memory of a bright and charming nature, taken in the very prime of her womanhood from her husband, her little child, and the relative, who was half as a mother and half as a sister to her. By the death of Mrs. Leon Ellis, née Kathleen Rowland, the last left in England of the happy young family who used to make the old Worthing-road Malthouse so pleasant a home to visit is lost to us, and she was laid to rest on Thursday with the four brothers and sisters who preceded her. "Till death us join," says Dean Stanley, is a "word yet more divine," than "Till death us part." Truly, she had many to meet; and the beautiful flowers that covered the coffin were tokens of the sorrow which her early departure had caused her friends.

London: Stepney Green.—The sixth and final conference of the special series on Christian Brotherhood was held at College Chapel on Sunday last, when the Rev. W. H. Lambelle gave an excellent address on "The Basis of Christian Brotherhood." Miss Florence Hill, who presided, referred in appreciative terms to the help rendered by ministers and others which had made those conferences so successful and spiritually helpful. They would be continued, and, on the first Sunday afternoon in July, at five o'clock, Dr. Herbert Smith would give the address. Mr. Lambelle said that to approach the family ideal in the reconstruction of society, when the welfare of each individual shall be the concern of all; when to wrong even the humblest member shall be felt as an injury to the whole, is a glorious vision, a sublime ideal. The great Teacher whose words will never fail to uplift the nations alone taught the universal Fatherhood of God with an all-embracing love, and this is the basis of all brotherhood. Religion is not, as some suppose, merely a bridge between this world and the next, but is a law of our souls, adapted to and intended for our life here. The object of the Gospel is to transform the socialism which rests on the basis of conflicting interests into the socialism which rests on the consciousness of a spiritual unity. Its social message can never be outgrown, because it teaches that we are here and now the children of God. All moral, social, economic and political evils may be removed by the influence of the great truths of the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Men. Illustrations of their power are to be found in the work of such men as Oberlin, Wilberforce, John Howard, Lincoln, and Garrison. How greatly the world needs to-day to realise the divine truths is shown in the growth of the military spirit, in the great trusts and monopolies, and in the increase of selfish indulgence. There is an urgent need for leaders with the spirit of Luther and Hampden. There must be a noble simplicity and self-respect, a lofty magnanimity. In the true spirit of Christian Brotherhood men must be consecrated anew to work for God and humanity. The address was followed by close attention, and at its conclusion there was the usual general and profitable discussion. Mr. Lambelle also gave an address at the evening service on "The Spirit of the Christian Life."

London: Stratford.—At a meeting of members and friends held on Wednesday, May 15, presided over by the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, Mr. W. J. Hawkins resigned the post of secretary, having filled the position for fourteen years. Great regret was expressed at the retirement of Mr. Hawkins as secretary, and a vote of appreciation of the services of both Mr. and Mrs. Hawkins for so many years was unanimously carried. Mr. W. J. Noel was elected secretary, with his son, Mr. E. Noel, as assistant secretary.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

A MEETING in aid of the South African Women and Children's Distress Fund is announced to be held at the Queen's Hall, Langham-place, on Monday, June 24, at eight o'clock, when Miss Emily Hobhouse, who has recently returned from the Women's Camps in South Africa, will describe the needs and condition of the women and children. The Bishop of Hereford is to preside. Admission is free, but a limited number of reserved seats at 1s. can be had from Mr. F. W. Lawrence, Mansfield House, Canning Town.

THE full text of Tolstoy's "Reply to the Synod's Edict of Excommunication and to Letters received concerning it," translated by Mr. V. Tchertkoff, will be published by the Free Age Press, of Christchurch, Hants, next week, in a penny pamphlet. The "Reply" contains Tolstoy's latest expression of his religious faith and position.

WE must still ask the patience of our readers, and especially of those interested in the Central Postal Mission and the Temperance Association, at the delay of those two reports.

THE British Weekly of June 6, referring to our National and International meetings in Whit-week, has a note on "Unitarianism, Christianity, and Buddhism," which we cannot suppose to be intentionally unfair, but which, to one who knows the facts, seems rather absurd. Referring to Mr. Stopford Brooke's sermon, and magisterially informing him that while he is "happily still under the spell of old ideas," in his career as a Unitarian "he has never faced the real problems," the note goes on to say that "year by year Unitarianism becomes more impatient of the Christian name." As to Mr. Graham Wallas's allusion to Buddhism, our readers will soon have an opportunity of judging for themselves from the full text of his very earnest address; but we will say here that, in our view, disciples of Jesus ought sorrowfully to admit the truth to which Mr. Wallas pointed, that in the recent unhappy events in China it is the Buddhists of Japan who most clearly manifested a truly Christian spirit. But, then, neither the Christian spirit nor the pure spiritual religion of Jesus appears to satisfy the demands of the British Weekly's dogmatic theology, and both Mr. Stopford Brooke and other single-hearted but heretical disciples of the Master must be content to rest under its condemnation.

THE Yearly Meeting of the Religious Society of Friends, held last week in London, has addressed to its members and to the Christian Churches "A Plea for a Peaceable Spirit," which we shall all do well to ponder. "Confronted with war's aftermath," the address declares, "the Christian conscience is ill at ease, and the way is open for the peaceable spirit of the gospel to re-assert itself in mind and heart."

Many who at first supported the war with honest conviction, recognise the moral deterioration that has marked its progress. Individuals have made heroic sacrifice for a cause which they believed to be just: many have borne with resignation the heaviest sorrow which can darken the home; but, in the nation as a whole, the merciless logic of war has induced the suppression of the nobler impulses, and has shut the door on the promptings of love. As passion has risen, the old story has been repeated; and once more the malice of man has trampled on the life of Christ. How lurid is the scene before us—in Africa the long-drawn struggle with its roll of disease and death, the devastation of the land, the burning of homesteads, the driving of destitute women and children into vast camps, the widening gulf of hate and bitterness between the two races; and in England the reign of prejudice, the fever of passion, the riots, the orgies in our streets, the preaching of vengeance by the Press and even from some pulpits. Had men seen these things when yet they deemed war a remedy, surely the conscience of both peoples would have recoiled from the conflict as from a crime. It is under this burden of the realities of war that we would press the question, "Can such strife be consistent with the spirit of Christ?"

The calling of the Christian Church is "to purify the national conscience, to build up national character, and to insist that in corporate as in individual life the one standard of conduct must be the standard of Christ." In strange contrast with this is the tone which has too long and too widely prevailed concerning the war.

The platform and the Press to-day proclaim aloud the false doctrine of force, and men will scarcely brook the slower methods of peace. But in South Africa force has not solved but complicated the racial and political problem. And in China the barbarism of the Allied intervention, with its atrocities in the name of Europe, must for long years retard missionary effort, and stamps with hypocrisy a civilisation which professes brotherhood, but practises revenge.

The issue lies plain before the Christian Church. On the one hand we see a growing reliance on military power for material ends, on the other the ideal of righteousness and love as the bond and foundation of empire. The ideal tarries through want of faith in the practical efficacy of the spirit and teaching of Christ.

Copies of this Plea may be had at the offices of the Society, 12, Bishopsgate Without, E.C.

THE Times of Saturday, the 8th inst., published the following earnest appeal, made by the Viceroy of India, at the conclusion of a speech at Simla, on June 6, at a meeting of the Army Temperance Association:—

What are we all here for, from the Viceroy at the head of the official hierarchy, to the latest-joined British private in barracks? We are not here to draw our pay, do nothing, have a good time, and merely wave the British flag; we are here because Providence has, before all the world, laid a solemn duty on our shoulders. That duty is to hold this country by justice, righteousness, and good will, and to set an example to its people. You may say, Why should we set an example? What example have we to set? Well, we have much to learn as well as to teach. It would be arrogant to pretend the contrary. I feel myself that never a day of my life passes in India in which I do not absorb more than I can possibly give out. But we have come here with a civilisation, education, and morality which we are vain enough, without disparagement to others, to think the best that has ever been seen. We have been placed by the Power that ordains all in the seats of the mighty, with the fortunes and the future of this great continent in our hands. There never was such a responsibility. In the whole world there is no such duty. That is why it behoves every one of us, great or small, who belongs to the British race in this country, to set an example. The man who sets a bad example is untrue to his own country; the man who sets a good one is doing his duty by this.

But how can the drunkard set an example, and what is the example that he sets, and what sort of an example, too, is set by the officer who winks at drunkenness, instead of treading it under foot? It is no answer to me to say that the native sometimes gets intoxicated in his way just as the British soldier does in his. One man's sin is not another man's excuse. Where are our boasted civilisation and our superior ethics if we cannot see that what is degrading in him is more degrading in us? If we are to measure our own responsibility by that of the millions whom we rule, what becomes of our right to rule and our mission? It is, therefore, officers and soldiers, not on mere grounds of abstract virtue, nor for the sake of the discipline and reputation of the Army, nor even for your own individual good alone, that I have stood here this afternoon to plead the cause of temperance in the ranks, but because the British name in India is in your hands just as much as it is in mine, and because it rests with you before God and your fellow-men to preserve it from sully or reproach.

THE paper on "The Thoughts and Experiences of a Liberal Religious Thinker and Worker in Russia," read by Vladimir Tchertkoff at the recent International Council meeting at Essex Hall, will be found printed in full in our present issue, and it is interesting in this connection to have a further word from Mr. Tchertkoff, as to his impressions of our meetings. In the Christian Life of last week, he speaks of the "joyful and invigorating impression" he received of the two days spent among our people, and contrasts this experience with what he had formerly found in connection with the meetings of other religious bodies. While there was always something helpful to be gained from them, he says, there was there the impression of "assisting at a display of the exceptional virtues of one particular society of believers, who regard themselves as the sole possessors of the one and only Truth"; and for one unable to join that select body, the result was repulsion and estrangement.

In your case, however, for the first time, in the midst of a religious society most sincere and firm in the views it represents, I did not experience this oppressive feeling. In fact, I did not at all feel as if I was assisting at the meetings of any particular denomination of believers, but simply as if I was amongst an assembly of ordinary fellow-men, not separated from the rest of mankind by any restrictions of opinion and creed. Only by the enthusiastic approbation which the audience invariably displayed for every vivid expression of higher spiritual aspiration one could see that one was in the midst of men and women whom a truly vital religious impulse had drawn together. By the equally earnest and warm sympathy called forth by any remark containing rational criticism of religious questions, one understood besides that the emotional element in the religion of those present had not torn itself away from the control of reason; and that here, indeed, one was assisting the realisation of only a truly rational religion, which is so absolutely indispensable for the further progress of the human consciousness.

I also experienced the exceedingly joyous feeling of participating in something which had not become definite and stable, but was advancing and developing; one sometimes even seemed tangibly to feel the growth of consciousness, as one followed the speeches which were being delivered. And this, I think, is the most essential and promising feature of the whole movement, manifesting its present vitality and ensuring unlimited possibilities in the future.

THERE is a fine institution in the town of Ipswich known as "The Social Settlement," in connection with which there are libraries, billiard tables, refreshment rooms, a nursing organisation, bible classes, debates, &c., and there is a large hall which will hold nearly a thousand people, which is often well filled in winter for concerts and limelight lectures. Soon after his settlement at Ipswich the Rev. Lucking Tavener, on the invitation of the Warden, gave a limelight lecture on G. F. Watts, R.A., which was much appreciated. Mr. Tavener was afterwards asked whether he was willing to be nominated a "Brotherhood member" of the Settlement, which implied a willingness to share in its work, and required election by a majority of the Council. Finding in the rules a statement that in carrying out the object of the Settlement,

It shall be the special aim that no sectarian or party advantage shall be sought, but that it shall be possible for all men to associate themselves in this good work, he thought this wide enough to admit the co-operation of a Unitarian minister, and willingly consented.

MR. TAVENER noticed, however, a further clause in the rules:—

The Brotherhood shall consist of Christian men of not less than eighteen years of age, who pledge themselves to active service in connection with the Settlement.

And subsequently the Warden drew his attention to this clause and urged him to withdraw his name from nomination, in order to avoid an unpleasant discussion, since the phrase "Christian men" had been purposely used by the founders to safeguard the orthodoxy of the Brotherhood. In reply, Mr. Tavener said that he understood the Warden to ask him to withdraw on the ground that he was not a Christian, and this of course he indignantly refused. But to the Warden and his Brotherhood no one is a Christian who "denies the revelation of the Sacred Trinity," and when the nomination came before the Council the election was not secured. The Brotherhood, therefore, had better look to their rule about "all men," and "this good work," and Mr. Tavener had an opportunity, which he did not neglect, of declaring to the people of Ipswich the faith of a Unitarian Christian.

AN anonymous "Unitarian correspondent," writing in this week's Christian World on "A New Note in Unitarianism," describes the change which, in his view, is taking place amongst us, in "reaction against the barren and unsatisfactory Theism of the last generation," laying renewed stress on the Personality of Jesus and asserting Christianity to be the Religion of the Incarnation. Referring to recent correspondence in these columns, and to our New Century meetings as bearing witness to this movement, the writer asserts that a prominent speaker at the New Century meetings

Accused those of his brethren who professed the views we have just sketched, of "immorality and infidelity."

Will the "Unitarian correspondent" of the Christian World, under his own name, substantiate that grave charge in these columns?

DR. CROTHERS AT OXFORD.

AT Oxford last Sunday there was a kind of aftermath of the New Century Meetings. The weather was still brilliantly fine, and the beautiful chapel of Manchester College was well filled by a large congregation that will not readily forget the occasion. The devotional portion of the service was, in part, taken by the Rev. J. E Carpenter, M.A., the remainder by the Rev. Dr. Crothers, of Cambridge, U.S., who also preached. His sermon was characterised by the same freshness of thought, simplicity of manner, charm of style, and absence of notes which produced such a marked impression in London. Refusing to be content with the idea that religion was intended merely for those who can live on pretty, tender sentiment, Dr. Crothers contended that, when truly understood and interpreted, its word is the strongest known to the world. He referred to the valuations based on quantity and quality, and with fine insight described the pessimistic illusions to which speculative, "superior" people, who live remote from the world of action, are liable. In conclusion, the preacher looked forward to the time when mankind, judging each other by what is highest and best within themselves, should again cry out with the ancient seer: "Hallelujah, Hallelujah, for the Lord God Omnipotent reigneth."

In the afternoon, through the kindness of Mr. and Mrs. Carpenter, the students of Manchester College had the opportunity of meeting Dr. Crothers, who, in a most helpful yet informal way, gave them the benefit of his experience of preaching and the best preparations for it.

MANY of our readers will have heard with sorrow of the death of Sir Walter Besant, who had been suffering for some time from gastric catarrh, but passed away with a suddenness quite unexpected last Sunday afternoon at his residence at Frognal End, Hampstead. A native of Portsmouth, where he was born in August, 1836, Besant early became a Londoner, and passed from a private school to King's College, and thence to Christ's College, Cambridge. For some years he served as senior professor in the Royal College of Mauritius, but in 1867 returned invalided to this country. He then wrote for the Press and became secretary of the Palestine Exploration Fund, but soon found his true place as a delightful story-teller, first in collaboration with Mr. James Rice, and after the death of his friend, independently. "All Sorts and Conditions of Men," which appeared in 1882, was notable, as having originated the People's Palace, in the East End. In 1895 Sir Walter Besant, at the instance of Lord Rosebery, was knighted, receiving the honour for literature, not only as a popular author but as having been the first chairman of the Society of Authors. He was not only a successful novelist, but a writer on French literature and a historian of London. Many young authors have owed to him help and sympathy which he always delighted to give. The funeral was at Hampstead Parish Church on Wednesday afternoon, the service being conducted by the vicar. Among those present were the Revs. Dr. Brooke Herford and P. H. Wicksteed, the Society of Authors being represented by Sir W. M. Conway, Mr. Anthony Hope, and others.

THE REV. S. FLETCHER WILLIAMS.

Welcome Home!

AFTER a voyage delayed beyond the expected time, the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams reached home on Monday, after his more than two and a-half years' service as representative of the B. and F.U.A. in India. Mr. Williams was to have remained for three years, but unfortunately the state of his health rendered an earlier return advisable. We had hoped that the voyage home would have restored Mr. Williams to his accustomed health; but he is not yet rid of the asthma which has troubled him, and he will still need some rest, and the restoratives which our English summer can so well administer, before he is ready for full work again.

It is pleasant to hear from India of the very cordial expressions of regard and gratitude from the members of the Brahmo Somaj and other friends which Mr. Williams received on his departure.

On Sunday, April 28, an address was presented to Mr. Williams by friends and admirers "in and outside the Brahmo Somaj," expressing sorrow at his departure, and gratitude for his devoted services. The address contained the following passage:—

We feel our acknowledgments for those services can never be adequate. You came as the representative of the British and Foreigh Unitarian Association to work in co-operation with the Brahmo Somaj in India. As such your relations with all the different sections of the Somaj in Calcutta and in the Mofussil have been most cordial; and we appreciate the impulse of sympathy and brotherliness which led you to make your appeal for a fuller union and co-operation amongst the Brahmo communities in matters in which doctrinal differences do not stand in the way. Your labours, however, have not been confined within the limits of the Brahmo community alone. You have endeavoured in your sermons to bring the light of a pure faith and spiritual strength into minds labouring under intellectual doubt and the moral lethargy and stagnation arising therefrom. Your literary discourses touched a deeper chord in the thoughtful section of the audience than usual with popular lectures in this country, and will, we earnestly hope, be a source of inspiration to some at least of the students for whom they were specially intended. We are deeply thankful also for that personal example of unsectarian love and self-denying labour, as well as broad religious culture and intellectual attainments combined with a spirit of simplicity, meekness and resignation so congenial to the Eastern mind, which you have so nobly set before us during these few years that it has been our privilege to have you in our midst. We can hardly express how much an example like yours is calculated to draw closer together the bonds of sympathy and union between ourselves and the great nation whom you represent, and whom Providence has set to rule over us.

Your short visit will always be with us a dearly cherished memory, and we are not even without hopes that there may be opportunities hereafter for us to welcome you back to our shores. But now it is time to say—Farewell! Accept our heart's love and esteem, and kindly convey to your brethren at home our grateful acknowledgments for all that they have done for us and our poor country—the thanks of the Brahmo Somaj, the appreciative sympathy and good wishes of the educated in our land—as also the blessings of those whom their munificent help has rescued from starvation. And may those ministrations of the Unseen Hand, which we trust have been with you in your busiest moments as well as by the side of your lonely bed of illness in this foreign land, ever be with you on the sea and in your distant home, and fill the rest of your career with that blessing and peace which passeth all understanding, and abideth for ever!

The address was accompanied by farewell gifts, consisting of a silver tea-set, of native design, and engraved with Indian scenes, a pair of shawls, and a silver casket to contain the address.

On the following Monday a deputation from the Sadharan Brahmo Somaj, headed by Pandit Sivanath Sastri, and including our friend, recently a student in Manchester College, Oxford, Mr. Hem Chandra Sarkar, presented an address to Mr. Williams, which, after speaking of the great indebtedness of the Brahmo Somaj to the B. and F.U.A., continued as follows:—

It is over two years and a-half now, since deputed by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, you landed in India. Since then you have been incessant in your endeavours to spread true religion and culture, carrying the gospel of pure love of God and service of man throughout the provinces of this vast land. Wherever you have been, your services have been highly appreciated by all sections of our countrymen, whose only regret has been that your stay among them has not been sufficiently long. Indeed, Sir, the demand for your services has been so great that the news of your sudden departure has come upon our brethren in many places as a great disappointment.

The metropolis of India has been particularly fortunate in profiting by your untiring and many-sided activity, inasmuch as your stay here has been the longest of all places. You have put yourself into connection not only with the theistic organisations, but also with bodies representing general culture. You have addressed to the educated public a series of literary discourses and lectures which have been universally prized and admired. With the various institutes connected with the Sadharan Brahmo Somaj you have worked with such sympathy and earnestness that the absence of your counsel and co-operation will hereafter be keenly felt. Your theistic services at the Albert Hall have been wonderfully inspiriting and edifying in their effect—drawing together thoughtful and cultured persons from all classes and holding up before them the high principles of universal religion and also the conception of spiritual life which looks upon the faithful performance of duty as the best service of God. Lastly, those amongst us who have had the privilege of associating with you closely, have been charmed with the charitableness of your disposition, the geniality of your temper, the breadth of your sympathy, the tenderness of your heart and the simple fervour of your piety.

Among your many services to the theistic cause in India we do not assign the lowest place to your efforts to bring the three sections of the Brahmo Somaj into greater co-operation in reference to all work of common utility. Though no practical benefit has at present resulted from your appeal to the general body of Brahmos for such co-operation, there is no doubt that it will prepare to help their mind for such a result coming about ultimately.

We greatly regret that illness compels you, much against your wish, to cut short your stay in India. We hope and pray that you will speedily recover your health and vigour. We fervently trust that you will be spared to us and your friends and admirers in England for many years yet of beneficent and valuable work, and that this will not be your last visit to this country. We have no doubt that your personality will serve as a connecting link between the theistic bodies of India and Great Britain, and we request you to bear our cordial greeting and thanks to our much esteemed brethren, the members of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

This address was beautifully printed on satin, and presented in a sandal-wood casket of exquisite workmanship.

In acknowledging the address, Mr. Williams said it had been a pleasure and privilege to him to co-operate with the members of the Brahmo Somaj. For his part he had learned many things since he had landed in India. Every nation had its own religious genius, and it was not desirable that any nation should forsake its own peculiar religious expression, but what is desirable and necessary is that each should supplement its own form by assimilating those of others. He was sure that they had to learn much from India, and if he were permitted, he would say that India also has to learn something from England. To him India seemed to be very rich in the contemplative or meditative side of religion, and his country was strong in what was called the practical side of religion. And it would be for the benefit of both the countries if one could lend the other something of her special gift, and imbibe some of the other's in return.

The Southern India Somaj also sent to Mr. Williams from Madras an illuminated address and a handsome writing-desk as a farewell gift.

THE INTERNATIONAL COUNCIL MEETINGS.

SIR,—May I, through your columns, offer my warmest thanks to the Unitarian promoters of these meetings for their hospitable generosity to those who are usually described by some other sectarian title? All concerned for the spread and the deepening of liberal religious thought owe them a debt of gratitude; and those who attended the International Council Meetings must have come away with a new consciousness of the meaning of their ideal and a new appreciation of its overwhelming consequence for and claim upon them.

I was most impressed, I think, by the clearness with which the supreme need of our age and of our lives seemed to be realised by the various speakers as the need for God-consciousness. If one could put their message into a sentence, is it not this—that it is the mission of the liberal religious movement to make the idea of God coincident with our most intimate experience of reality, both by clarifying that idea, and by intensifying that experience?

Our movement is the immortal enemy of "the spirit that denies" whether it call itself religious orthodoxy or scientific scepticism.

The liberal religious thinker puts aside the problems of a scholastic theology, in order that he may refute the great negation of religion in which all obscurantisms and scepticisms find their final stronghold, the denial of possible communion with God, that is to say of His Fatherhood. That that communion is the right of every spirit, and that its attainment, however you may describe such attainment, is the purpose of religion, this appears to be the broad and essential basis of liberal religious thought. Perhaps the basis is even broader, or the idea may be better expressed in some other vocabulary than mine, but it cannot be without this purpose if it is "religious" at all. Phrase it how you will, our testimony must ultimately be against the intervention of any agent between our consciousness and God—the living, self-conscious Spirit of Truth. We must dare to regard with strenuous mistrust every gospel that would set the heart at rest, every philosophy which would satisfy the mind, unless it brings the soul into this communion, the true relation of the Ego to the universe.

Deeper and wider grows the Unitarian message: and those who deliver it demand that its great truth of the Unity of the Universe in one God, should be realised alike in our thought of God and of His creatures—in our relations to men and to things—in our occupations, and in the aims and methods of our life and its work. A glance at the programme of our meetings shows, I think, how largely the International Council interprets the meaning of that message. And Unitarians, if they can avoid too absorbing an interest in sheer theology, can bring more, perhaps, than others to that humanitarian impulse which is the worthiest characteristic of our age. They have the courage and the liberty of thought which alone can and must widen the content and deepen the significance of Brotherhood. That has been done by such addresses as those of Graham Wallas, Philip Wicksteed, and Vladimir Tcherkoff. And liberal religious thinkers will in future be more and more ready to recognise the humanitarian consequences of their theological attitude, they will attack the evident social, industrial, and political problems of this century as fearlessly as they attacked the theological problems of the last.

It is because I have felt such unity with the spirit of these Essex Hall meetings, rejoicing in its catholic hospitality to stranger-truths, however unexpected, that I will venture to draw attention to another truth which appears to be passing by unrecognised. In my own mind one need remained unsatisfied, and I believe that in this I was not alone. For the value of periods of devotional silence in religious services is beginning to be widely recognised, and will, I believe, prove a source of strength to any body of thinkers and of worshippers employing them. As Mr. Jacks so truly said, we are liberals because in ourselves we experience the inflowing of that creative spirit of reality which is the Infinite Truth, and God. But is it not always a difficulty with some, that they suppose intellectual apprehension to be the equivalent of vital experience, and mistake the shadow for the thing itself? And, if this be so, may not a devotional meeting held upon a basis of silence bring among the worshippers that spirit of searching personal inquiry which is more immediate and intimate than any audible voice? It is time that the power of silence may be deeply felt amid human solitude, as Wordsworth found it in fellowship with the wordless woods:—

> "Whose ministry it is
> To interpose the covert of . . . [their] shades
> Even as a sleep, between the heart of man
> And outward troubles, between man himself
> Not seldom, and his own uneasy heart."
> —Prelude xii. 24-28.

But is there not a still higher possibility for this wordless human fellowship in devotion—a possibility which no church can afford to neglect of Pentecostal experience as a church? The bond of fellowship which is formed by such communion is, perhaps, the most intimate of all. One remembers how George Fox felt it necessary at times to "starve from words" the people met together to listen to his preaching, in order that, in the common silence, they might all become conscious of their spiritual poverty. Then, convinced of the uselessness of any other thing but communion with the living truth, they became eager for Him to enter their hearts and minds. Whether through silence or through speech, that is the object of worship—to be starved from words, it may be, but to feed upon the Truth of Life.

And without some periods of congregational silence we are almost certain to allot a disproportionate value to the merely intellectual apprehension of a truth which we have no immediate opportunity to appropriate. If the noblest eloquence and the most courageous philosophic thought are to attain their end, they must sow the seed of truth in the very soil of the soul. And according to the duly established methods of husbandry and laws of life, that seed must be covered over, and so, as it were, appropriated by that soil, if it is to grow. Otherwise there is no harvest. There is need for severer reality, rather than for more symbolic ritual in congregational worship, if it is to realise that communion which is, as I suppose, the basis of Liberal Religious Thought.

IMPRESSIONS OF WHIT-WEEK.

IV.

IN the days of the meetings of the Old Testament Revision Company, we are told that a party of visitors to the Jerusalem Chamber were barred at the entrance by a pompous official (kinsman doubtless to our gorgeous friends in green and gold, with plaster-cast hair and fatted calves at the Mansion House) who exclaimed, "The Old Testament is now sitting, sir." A door-keeper similarly inspired, standing at the doors of Essex Hall, but throwing them wide open to all the world, might similarly have made a stentorian proclamation (a shot and not a bad one either, that should be "heard round the world"), "The New Reformation is now sitting." And if the Young Movement will not resent it, we might apply to it and its warm environment (physical and spiritual) Lady O'Hagan's pretty figure of the Incubator. The young giant was being helped on to its legs by liberal and continuous doses of food for reflection—a "stream of facts" and "a flow of soul." The needful thing now is that what the delegates heard in camera should henceforth be proclaimed on the housetops. If I may parody Professor Bonet-Maury's allusion to Calvin's word to some churches asking for ministers, "Send us wood and we will send you arrows," I think the Grand National or, rather, the Grand International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers should say to the Churches, "Send us delegates and we will send you back missionaries." And he must be a wooden delegate, indeed, who did not feel himself becoming "a polished shaft kept close in the quiver of the Lord." Well might the invitation to this Council be printed in letters of gold on a red background. It is to "all who are willing to come together for the study of the essentials of Religion as things of the Spirit and Purpose—things too great for dogmatic expression and too exalted for credal affirmation or denial"; to "all those who desire to see the world become better, and are willing to work together for this betterment." And the object is specifically stated to be, "to open communication with those in all lands who are striving to unite pure Religion and perfect Liberty, and to increase fellowship and co-operation among them." And behold here was the first-fruits. Many men and many minds, many teachers and many churches, "distinct as the billows but one as the sea." How shall one even outline one's impression of the dissolving views that in endless ways revealed this "magnificent incongruity of opinion," keeping the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace? Well, the New Reformation is launched. The goal is known; but the way, the means, the steering, the rocks, the storms—all that is hereafter. What's to come is still unsure; but as Jean Paul der Einzige convincingly teaches, "Das Ziel muss man früher kennen, als die Bahn." And never was the end better set forth and never did men better set forth to find it. For once in a way we felt we were making History, or at least doing deeds worthy of the notice of the Historian. Till that greater man record the events, we, from our light skiff, tossing on the summer sea, note how the big ship got under way, forgetting much, it is to be feared, that we ought to remember, and remembering much that we ought to forget. But before we forget we ought to remember the indispensable and indefatigible Secretaries. Those who heard their praise will not soon forget it, nor yet Mr. Secretary Bowie's latest claim to fame. Whenever Mr. Bowie has his knife in any of us again, we will gratefully remember the childlike American who with admiring gaze fathered on the canny Scot the invention of the Bowie-knife, and an echo of the Homeric laughter that greeted this cutting remark will heal our wounds. He must have been repaid for all the fiery darts of the wicked anti-Unitarians, by the plaudits that showed appreciation of his Herculean labours on behalf of the Pan-Unitarian gatherings. The panting early bird on vermicular errands bent toiled after him in vain. And never did we realise what Mrs. Bowie could do in the way of afternoon teas for the "numberless throng," till we discovered what the Lord Mayor of London with the whole force of the Empire at his back could not do.

As we cast our eyes, now at a respectful distance, over the eminent actors of those Meetings, as over an Alpine landscape, the pre-eminent alone can be noted, and these but with a word. There was a "Jungfrau" or two and one edle Frau towering clear, distinct and inspiring, winning universal admiration for silvery speech. Among the foreign delegates were "some severals of head-piece extraordinary"; many had a remarkable command over the English language and some had not. As there was a feast of languages, we were treated to some of the scraps. M. Montet with consummate elocution answered in his own person his great fellow-countryman's question "Qui est-ce qui sait éviter le trop et le trop peu?" M. Fontanès succeeded in avoiding only the trop peu, but he afterwards told me that the intelligent applause of his audience beguiled him into heading for le trop. "Und das hat mit ihrem Singen die Lorelei gethan."

Thursday was the great International day, and it was signalised by the finest efforts of oratory—American, English, and Russian. One "sensation" after another (to borrow a barbarism of the Press) followed, culminating in the Russian's apotheosis of Tolstoy. Dr. Crothers, "in dimension and shape of nature a gracious person," was charming, and it was doubted whether anything finer could be done. Mr. Graham Wallas, in a totally different way, swayed all minds with a kind of omnipotence which even the obvious bit of special pleading on behalf of Japanese Buddhism hardly diminished. Later in the day Mr. Tchertkoff's most remarkable paper, most remarkably delivered, swift and clear—he himself commanding in stature and grave of visage—carried the position by storm, and seemed to reveal that though many of us love truth, we love Tolstoy more, and Tolstoy's friend almost as much: and after all the attainable is always more satisfactory than the unattainable.

Considering the late and latent developments in Unitarian metaphysics and the cheap excursions into the regions of the Incarnation, Mr. Armstrong's paper takes a prominent place. Much of his old well-known verve was there. If that paper has not scotched the nascent doctrine of the Incarnation in Unitarian places then is sarcasm ill repaid for the beauty of its method, and plain Saxon translation (enfleshment for incarnation) ill rewarded for its exposure of the unspirituality of the alleged spiritual. Amongst the magnificent performances were the sermon by Mr. Stopford Brooke, and the address of the President of the International Council, Professor Carpenter. A gem is helped much by its setting, and Stopford Brooke in a church and his sermon from a pulpit would have afforded the necessary background and freedom. As Professor Carpenter uttered the words, "Religion can have but one object, the everlasting God; one centre on which it rests immovable, the infinite Spirit in which we live and move and have our being," we felt that this Council, "which in truth is of no denomination," had something of the Eternal about it. We felt we could apostrophise it in Emerson's grandiloquent words:—

> Ages are thy days,
> Thou grand affirmer of the present tense
> And type of permanence!

Permanent, we believe, it will be, even in its temporal form—until the stone wall of opposition collapses and the partition walls crumble away before periodic bombardments of such sweet reasonableness seasoned with salt,

> For it is on Zodiacs writ
> Adamant is soft to wit.

V.

IT has not been possible for me to attend many of the previous Whit-week meetings in London; but I can say unhesitatingly that the most interesting and stimulating within my experience were those of last week. From first to last the papers and addresses were stirring and unapologetic. We met as the representatives of a body which, though small, has come to realise that it holds a very prominent and honourable position in the world of religious thought, and which has the satisfaction of knowing that its principles are leavening all the Churches. The declarations were bold and free, emphasising the fact that however thankful we are for that which appeals to us as truth, we recognise that there can be no finality in those revelations of the Infinite which dawn upon men's minds from age to age. It struck me, too, that there was a growing fearlessness in the use of the word Unitarian, as if it were being realised, after all, that the danger of its coming to stand for dogmatic doctrine and exclusiveness was imaginary and not real; and certainly no utterances could be freer from the purely sectarian spirit than those which proceeded from the official representatives of both the British and Foreign and the International Council.

These meetings have burnt into my heart and conscience the fact that religiously, as in all other ways, as soon as we cease to progress, develope, grow, we shall die; and also that healthy intellectual and spiritual life is impossible without great diversity of opinion and sentiment. Meetings like these ought to draw us all closer together, accentuate the essential principles upon which we are agreed, and stimulate us to engage with all the zeal and power we possess in the work of spreading abroad a knowledge of God, as He has been revealed to our own souls, and a serious recognition of that human duty which follows inevitably from God's fatherhood and man's brotherhood.

LITERATURE.

THE SOCIAL PROBLEM.*

WE heartily welcome Mr. Hobson back into the field of English Economics. He is a careful thinker, who grudges no pains in order to arrive at the final conclusions to which his reasoning leads, and so reach the legitimate end of his inquiry. He is also a stimulating and often entertaining writer, in close touch with realities, and with a quick eye to see their most interesting features; and whether or not we agree with all he says, he does us the service of compelling us to think out our own reasoning, and examine the validity of the premises which we assume as its foundation.

He is one of the many writers who now severely criticise the older political economy. It may be questioned whether these critics realise the need there was for the work done by these older economists. Protection was defended on the ground that it would enrich the nation, and it was needful to prove that Free-trade would not impoverish a country. This was best done by the economists taking the premises and accepting the limitations imposed by their opponents, and showing, under these conditions, what is the true state of the case. That was useful work, and there were other fallacies of the same kind which could best be exposed in the same way. But it may be willingly admitted now that such economic reasoning takes us but a very little way towards a complete science of well-being, or an art of living, which shall solve the social problem. Mr. Hobson is fully persuaded that human society is an organism, not a mechanism. You can break up a mechanism into its component parts, and study separately the working of each part, and then when you re-combine the parts, you can accurately calculate how the whole will work. But you cannot adopt this method with a living organism. The moment you take it to pieces you destroy something essential, the activity of the whole is not the arithmetical sum of the activities of the component parts; nor can these be examined in isolation. The "economic man," whose motives are artificially limited to laziness and greed, is too grotesque a caricature to furnish much aid towards the solution of real problems in life.

Mr. Hobson's wish is to furnish us with an introduction to the science and art of social progress, to "ask and answer certain preliminary questions which confront thinking men and women who are interested in work of social reform, and wish to reach satisfactory intelligible principles for their guidance in such work." What he says on "Cost of Production" (p. 44 sq.) affords a good example of how he asks his questions. "Cost" is now generally distinguished from expenses, and the word is used to signify the labour-force put into the production of goods, not the reward paid as wages for such labour-force. But with this change, which is absolutely necessary for correct analysis, cost becomes impossible to calculate. Some work is essentially degrading and brutalising: other work so tends to shorten life that it is futile to maintain that it is paid for by higher wages: it is taken by those who practically feel they have no choice in the matter. Other work is in itself in the highest degree humanising and educational; it puts into the man who does it far more than it takes out of him. Again,

> In order to know the real cost represented by £1,000 of textile goods, we must know not only the quantity of labour power (measured objectively) and the conditions under which it is given out, but how it is distributed among the workers. If it is shared among a large number of able-bodied men and women during a reasonably short working day, the cost may be light. If it is sweated out of a small number of enfeebled workers, driven to a high intensity of effort during a long working day, supplemented by overtime, the cost is immeasurably greater. The most interesting work becomes a painful toil if continued too long; the most toilsome work is comparatively light and wholesome if given out in small quantities.

A chapter entitled "Distribution according to Needs" affords a good example of what Mr. Hobson has to say in this book by way of answers to questions. A just system of distribution may be attempted in accordance with the facts indicated by one or other of these three words—Effort, Productivity, Needs. It is impossible to calculate Effort except by reference to Productivity, and these two terms practically become one. Hitherto, this has been widely accepted as the standard, but now it is largely giving way to the far more satisfactory standard of Needs. A man is given the salary which he really needs to keep up the position which he is required to keep up. The same feeling recognises the validity of the demand for "a living wage." We set aside from this consideration all false demands of fashion, and so forth; and then we can clearly see how legitimate needs grow when the demand is for high-grade labour.

A science and an art which solve the social problem will prevent waste—waste of life, of effort, of resourced. It will secure us the full utility of all we have and do. Mr. Hobson thinks that Utilitarianism has been too absolutely condemned. What deserves condemnation is the narrowness which confined utility to the production of happiness, and assumed that all happiness stood on one level. We should maintain that Christianity and the conception of a Kingdom of God to be established upon earth is required before we can reach the full meaning of the larger Utility for which he pleads, but we are grateful to him for the assistance with which he brings us on our way so far as we can go together, and heartily wish all success to this valuable and interesting book. H. Shaen Solly.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

The June number of the Nineteenth Century and After opens with an article on "British Pessimism," by Andrew Carnegie, containing lessons of a better courage and wisdom for our people, if only they will avoid in future "the aggressive temper which alienates other Governments and peoples, and which has mistaken territorial acquisition for genuine empire-making." America, with its vast natural resources and far greater and increasing population, is bound, in Mr. Carnegie's view, to hold the first place in the world's commerce; but though British pride may suffer a salutary check, that is no reason why her true prosperity should suffer. This article is followed by Mr. Frederic Harrison's "Impressions of America," which are fascinating reading, full of sympathetic appreciation and wise judgment. Of Chicago, which as a city is not so old as its observer, and which in Mr. Harrison's view is destined to become the chief city of the Republic, he writes:—

> Chicago struck me as being somewhat unfairly condemned as devoted to nothing but Mammon and pork. Certainly, during my visit, I heard of nothing but the progress of education, university endowments, people's institutes, libraries, museums, art schools, workmen's model dwellings and farms, literary culture, and scientific foundations. I saw there one of the best equipped and most vigorous art schools in America, one of the best Toynbee Hall settlements in the world, and perhaps the most rapidly developed university in existence. My friends of the Union League Club, themselves men of business proud of their city, strongly urged me to dispense with the usual visit to the grain elevators and the stockyards, where hogs and oxen are slaughtered by millions and consigned to Europe, but to spend my time in inspecting libraries, schools, and museums. No city in the world can show such enormous endowments for educational, scientific, and charitable purposes lavished within ten years, and still unlimited in supply.

Mr. Harrison witnessed the ceremony of the Inauguration of the President at Washington last March, and his description of the scene, and the contrast between the plain Americans and the gaudy representatives of European Courts, is both amusing and instructive. Of the New World as a whole his impression is that it offers "a great field, both moral and intellectual, to the peaceful development of an industrial society," and that its society is, "in the main, sound, honest, and wholesome."

These two articles should be read, especially by anyone inclined to be depressed by the articles on "The Economic Decay of Great Britain," by the author of "Drifting," the second of which is in this month's Contemporary. Mr. H. Morgan-Browne, in the same review, also offers an antidote in his article, "But are we Decaying?" severely criticising what he regards as the incompetent handling of statistics by that alarmist writer. In the Contemporary the articles on "Communal Recreation," by Charles Charrington, and "The Missionary in China," by H. C. Thompson, are specially noteworthy, and Mr. H. V. Weisse on "Reading for the Young" should also be read. The opening article is a timely and trenchant criticism of "The Government Education Bill," by Mr. Lyulph Stanley.

In the Nineteenth Century and After there is also a vigorous article on "The Education Bill," by Dr. T. J. Macnamara, M.P., with which should be read also Professor Starling's article on "The Pressing Need for More Universities." Lord Curzon sends a plea for interest in this country in "The Queen Victoria Memorial Hall in India," and Dr. Wirgman, of Grahamstown, writes unsympathetically on "The Religion of the Boers."

In the Monthly Review Mr. H. C. Thompson has an article on "The Policy of the Powers in China," a useful companion to his Contemporary article, which both missionaries and diplomatists would do well to consider. He pleads for a more sympathetic understanding of the Chinese, and for the Christian law of forbearance, in place of a temper aggressive and vindictive, of which even missionaries cannot be altogether acquitted. The first editorial article is educational, on "The Pyramid of Studies," of which the conclusion is that "our curriculum is good enough; our manipulation of it makes it futile and barren." There is a very amusing article by Miss Mary Cholmondeley on "An Art in its Infancy"—the art of advertising, illustrated from a bundle of eighteenth-century newspapers. The illustrated article this month is a further installment of Mr. R. E. Fry's series, "Florentine Painting of the Fourteenth Century."

OBITUARY.

MRS. TARABIA NAGARKAR.

The many friends of Mr. B. B. Nagarkar will learn with sorrow that his wife has been taken from him. On Sunday, May 19, at Hyderabad (Sindh), under the pangs of premature childbirth, she passed away. Owing to the repeated plague visitations in Bombay, Mr. Nagarkar left that city soon after his return from England towards the close of 1899, and has since been Headmaster in one of the Higher Schools in Hyderabad. Mrs. Nagarkar was about thirty years of age, and leaves behind her four young boys. Born in one of the privileged classes of her own country, she had outgrown the superstitions of Caste and Idolatry, and was heartily at one with her husband in the many social and religious reforms for which the Brahmo Somaj works. Sincere sympathy will be felt for Mr. Nagarkar and his motherless boys.

WELL-DRESSING AT TISSINGTON.

There is no reason why crowds of holiday folk should go to Tissington; it is a quiet place, with ample spaces among its few cottages and round the Church and the Hall, wide grassy margins, a village pond, some fine trees, and five natural fountains of clear water, whose streams flow through the village. These five wells are the occasion of Tissington's great annual festival on Ascension Day; the ceremony is interesting to the antiquarian, pleasing to the artist, and delightful to the lover of simple Nature and human nature; but the ordinary tripper should not be encouraged to go to it; it would not please him, and he would destroy it. The nearest public-house is half a mile away, and is but a little inn, hardly distinguishable from a cottage, with no resplendent show of plate-glass and metal and paint, a very poor and homely affair, no doubt, though able to provide necessary fare for the passer-by. Those who love to linger among childlike thoughts, and who find men and women charming when they are most like children, and mingle their souls with the life of Nature, may be very happy to join the procession at Tissington at the time of well-dressing.

Morning service is held in the solid, squat, firmly-founded village church, which looks as though it would not be disturbed by a thousand hurricanes. Long before service-time the congregation begins to assemble from many parts of Derbyshire, and immediately adjoining Staffordshire, and before service begins the church is thronged. A few fresh flowers of spring grace the font and the chancel steps. After morning prayer and a short sermon, the congregation troops out behind the officiating clergy, and in turn visits the five wells of the village, at each of which two hymns, one of them usually a psalm, are sung, with some reference to the symbolism of water, "As the hart pants," "The Lord is my shepherd," and "Rock of ages."

The decoration of the wells is not garlands of flowers, but mosaics of petals; the blossoms of the flowers are used to form a mass of colour, a design painted in rose leaves, apple blossoms, and other flowers. The picture and its framing of architectural design has as its basis wooden boards covered with putty, on which are affixed the petals; for white background, rice is largely used; for green masses, the flower of the sycamore. The flowers are nearly all wildflowers or flowers from the neighbouring gardens, which have been collected by the children for days past. The actual work of decoration, I was told, occupied two days, and while each well is to a large extent arranged by a single family, friends and neighbours help, and the children range far and near to get the flowers.

The designs are very effective, both in conception and execution; each wall was a work of art. On one the central picture was a ship sailing on the sea; another depicted a swan; a castle, with meadowland and trees in the foreground, was the subject of the well which faces the old Hall; a somewhat daring, but quaintly successful, subject was that of the shepherd's well in a sidewalk easily missed by the stranger; sheep were pictured in the midst of meadows, with trees consisting of twigs of fir and other realistic devices; the fifth well was given over to an elaborate and well-executed patriotic design, and inscribed, "God Save the King!"

In all cases the perception of harmony of colour was noticeable both in the general arrangement and in the way in which coloured petals were strewn in front of the the well. When a barrier was needed it was made of the branches of trees with their fresh green leaves. The clear water flowing beneath showed how much Tissington has had to be thankful for.

The tradition that the well-dressing originated in the Roman period, or was seized upon by the Romans and marked with their mark, is strengthened by the romanesque tendency in the designs and their mosaic character. It seems probable that a beautiful custom much older than Christianity, in close kinship with classical conceptions and in touch with the feeling that made Cornish wells sacred, the reputed abode of supernatural beings, is still alive in Derbyshire, having been blended with a Christian festival which occurred at about the same time of year. Early Christianity often made itself at home with Pagan customs and mingled its legends and beliefs with them, and at Tissington Ascension Day service and the dressing of the wells belong together. Over two of the wells were mottoes specially referring to the Christian festival "Christ is risen," "He is gone up."

After the procession and the singing were over, and the parsons had gone into the parsonage, the people scattered to their homes or strewed themselves over the ample margins of grass to take their refreshment. A few cottages provided simple fare, and several stalls sold unsubstantial trifles—sweets and gingerbread; but those who wanted hearty fare would need either to go home for it or bring it with them.

A day spent with country folk in these simple devotions and cheerful festival helps one to realise how much of happy simplicity and graceful joy our city civilisation has left behind it.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

DID you ever hear the story of Flitter, the little dove who was a peace-maker? It is said to be a true story, and was told years ago in Harper's Young People.

Flitter was only a plain little dove-coloured dove, and seemed to be the commonest kind of bird, but that she was not.

Teddy Barker, the miller's boy, first noticed her, and made friends by feeding her. He called her Flitter because she flittered down so lightly and prettily when she came to be fed. In winter they had made a new henhouse for their fowls, and the little dove was put in too, to be out of the cold.

At first the hens were jealous, and pecked her and cackled at her angrily. But she just flew softly out of the way, and after a few days they got quite used to her and fond of her, so that they liked to have her perched beside them at night.

One day the little boy came running to his father in great excitement to come and see something. There were two of the hens fighting angrily. Flitter was on the perch just above them, and was evidently in great distress. She fluttered about making little sounds of distress, and then at last could bear it no longer. So she flittered gently down, right between the two angry hens. It was a brave thing for the little bit of a dove to do, with those two great cross hens ready with their sharp beaks and their bad temper; but perhaps by that time they were ashamed of themselves. At any rate, they did not hurt their little friend, and the fight was stopped.

After that, whenever there was quarrelling in the henyard, the little bird came down to act as peace-maker.

I have often thought of the story of that little dove since first I read it long ago, and I have sometimes told it when I have been speaking to children about the text, "Blessed are the peacemakers."

There are children who are like that little dove, so gentle and peaceable; it always makes noisy, quarrelsome children ashamed of themselves when they are there. No one would think of hurting those little ones, and it helps others to be kind and peaceable only to think of them.

Now I wonder whether any of the children who read this column know any good stories about gentleness and peace-making which they would like to tell the others. If any of you do, send them to THE INQUIRER for the "Children's Column," and then, perhaps, I shall be able to print them, and it will be interesting to us all.

WE seek for ourselves wisdom and understanding that we may attain to higher rank in the scale of creation, be of more worth in the world. Let us then make it our business, as it is our duty, to give freely even as we have received, of the stores which generations have accumulated for our service. What we keep for ourselves is lost, only what we impart is saved.—Charles Hargrove.

BEYOND THE HILLS.

A STRANGE peaked shadow falls upon the plain
That smiles beneath the beams
Of the benignant sun. Without a stain
The azure heaven gleams,
While on the earth below the tiny streams
Confess a hidden ray.
Thus through the glowing day
The valley has rejoiced. All Nature's strings
Seem to be struck by some great master-hand,
Till every hedgerow, tree, and meadow sings
In mystic music grand,
To swell the hymn of praise
The feathered songsters raise.
O'er all the joy a shadow slowly creeps
From out the West, and glides
Over green field and wood,
Until the exuberant life of summer sleeps
In melancholy mood,
And each frail blossom hides
Its treasure 'neath its close-locked petals fair.
Clear is the upper air,
Blue and serene, resplendent with the sun;
Scarcely as yet has evening's reign begun.
Whence comes this blighting shade,
Neither by storm nor night's on-coming made?
Ye dwellers in the vale,
This darkness on your lands and homesteads laid,
Need not your hearts assail
With fear of threatened ill.
This spreading gloom is cast
By the all-glorious sun that now has passed
Beyond the mighty hill,
That bulwark range which shelters you secure,
Built as a strong defence that shall endure
Through future ages sure.
E'en when this giant cloud the valley fills,
The sunset gold sublime
You yet may see if you will rise and climb
Those everlasting hills.

A shadow sometimes falls upon our life,
Stealing its joy and light
Like the advancing night,
For peace and hope giving despair and strife,
Closing each cherished bloom
With chill as of the tomb.
Yet has the sun of Love
Not vanished wholly from our heaven above,
But, sunk beyond the heights that guard our rest,
Still shines effulgent in the radiant West;
And if we yearn to see
Once more that pure and perfect majesty,
Let faith but brace the will,
And lead us upward from the levels, till
We stand upon the hill.

LONDON, JUNE 15, 1901.

THE EDUCATION BILL.

A MONTH ago we drew attention to the grave issues involved in the Government's Education Bill then just introduced into Parliament by Sir JOHN GORST, and concluded by urging attendance at the National Conference of Progressive Educationalists, to be held at the King's Hall, Holborn, on June 6.

That Conference was duly held as announced, on Thursday afternoon of last week, under the presidency of Earl SPENCER, and was a most remarkable and significant meeting, in which as many as 1,850 delegates took part, representing educational, political, religious and trade organisations in all parts of the country, and showing a splendid front of enlightened and determined friends of popular education. All differences of sect and party were forgotten in the one great interest of the advancement of education, for the sake of the highest welfare of the people and the security and prosperity of the country.

This Conference was one among many signs of the widespread anxiety felt on the subject of the Government Bill, as threatening the future of sound and progressive education, and the determination to use every effort to prevent the mischievous results, which seem inevitable if it should pass into law. On the previous day a largely attended meeting of the General Committee of the Liberal Federation was held at Westminster, when some hundreds of members were present from all parts of the country, and the Bill was subjected to vigorous criticism. Resolutions were passed declaring the urgent need for a thorough reorganisation of the general machinery of education in England, so that the whole work of public education, elementary, secondary and technical, might be entrusted in each district to some one responsible and popularly elected local body; and further, declaring the unsatisfactory nature of the Government Bill, and urging the most strenuous opposition.

In the same sense the General Committee of the National Evangelical Free Church Council have condemned the Bill, which in this month's Contemporary Review Mr. LYULPH STANLEY has subjected to a searching and most damaging examination, while in the Nineteenth Century and After it is the subject of a no less vigorous attack by Dr. T. J. MACNAMARA, M.P.

At the meeting of the National Conference the resolutions offered and passed (with the amendment below referred to) were as follows :—

I.

That the Government Education Bill is at variance with the principles which were adopted by Parliament in the Act of 1870, especially as regards the creation of authorities elected on a popular basis and as regards unsectarian education. That the Bill offers no solution of the present educational difficulties, and, under existing conditions, there is no reasonable prospect that it can be made a suitable measure by amendments. All friends of the progressive development of national education are, therefore, urged to offer it the most strenuous opposition.

II.

That this conference is resolutely opposed to (a) all attempts to injure or put an end to the Higher Grade Schools and Evening Continuation Schools; (b) to the policy of making preferential grants to schools under private and denominational management; (c) discouraging the establishment of new School Boards; (d) conferring powers, incompatible with the public interest, upon diocesan and other irresponsible Associations; (e) treating School Boards inequitably as to grants and remission of local rates; (f) administering Free Education grudgingly and harshly; (g) condoning breeches of the Cowper Temple Clause; (h) maintaining the "grievous injustice to teachers" and injury to education involved in the present system of sectarian training colleges.

III.

That to provide an efficient system of National Education the following reforms are most urgently necessary :—

1. That the principle of public management by means of popularly elected local bodies should be applied to all schools receiving assistance from public funds.

2. That there should be popularly elected bodies in every part of the country, and that these authorities should be directly elected for the purpose of education, and have only educational duties to perform.

3. That the area of the authority charged with the provision of elementary education should be fixed with special regard to the efficient management of elementary schools, and that powers of combination should be given to such authorities.

4. That the constitution of local authorities should be definitely prescribed by Parliament.

5. That the ratepayers should have freedom in selecting all the members of the local education authority without statutory restrictions as to residence or non-residence, without any property qualification or sex disqualification or any exclusion of the clergy.

6. That it should be the duty of the local authority to provide sufficient school accommodation and efficient and suitable instruction for every available scholar who is not otherwise provided for.

7. That the amount of expenditure from local funds for local education purposes should not be subject to any statutory limitation, but should be decided by the local electors acting through the local education authority.

8. That the provisions of the "Conscience Clause" (section 7) and the "Cowper Temple Clause" (section 14) of the Education Act of 1870, should apply to all schools, colleges or other institutions aided or maintained by the local education authority.

9. That it should be the duty of the education authorities, singly or in combination, to establish Training Colleges under public management, and free from sectarian tests, in numbers adequate to the educational requirements of the country.

An amendment to the first resolution, preferring to attempt amendment of the Government Bill rather than its rejection, was lost by an overwhelming majority; but a further amendment, moved by Mrs. BYLES, of Bradford, protesting against the hindrances placed in the way of the due participation of women in the work of education, was unanimously adopted, and the resolution was passed with that addition.

As a result of all the discussion that has taken place, it is quite clear what the friends of progressive education must work for. There seems no prospect that the Bill now before Parliament can receive the consideration due to its scope and the importance of the issues at stake, and if the Government, with their great majority, insist on pressing it through the House, as Mr. BALFOUR has indeed declared to be necessary, it can only be by a ruthless use of the closure, which would be a scandal of the gravest kind. We must therefore hope that the Bill may after all be abandoned, and that a short non-contentious Bill may be allowed at once to pass, securing the interest of the thousands of pupils affected by the Cockerton judgment, at any rate for the coming year; and that hereafter a fully matured scheme of legislation, dealing with the needful readjustment of authorities and the better organisation of National Education as a whole, may be brought forward for the consideration of Parliament and the country.

THE THOUGHTS AND EXPERIENCES OF A LIBERAL RELIGIOUS THINKER AND WORKER IN RUSSIA.

BY VLADIMIR TCHERTKOFF.*

HAVING availed myself of what I feel to be the great privilege so kindly offered me of addressing this meeting, I should like first of all to state why it is that I have the deepest sympathy, respect, and admiration for the work which is being accomplished for humanity by the so-called Unitarian movement. Being expected, as I understand, to communicate something about my personal life, I should, however, wish to allude to myself only in so far as my own experience has brought me in contact with the great cause of rational religion which has united us here on this occasion.

Brought up, as probably not a few here present were, in the conventional orthodox creed of my country, I felt, while yet almost a youth, the imperative necessity of carefully testing the authority upon which were based the beliefs inculcated into me from infancy. This, naturally, very soon elicited misgivings as to the reliableness of the miraculous and dogmatic element, until then inseparably interwoven in my mind with the true religious spirit. This true spirit I valued so highly that I felt an inexpressible dread merely at the thought of the possibility of having to give it up should the external authority I was questioning prove untenable. Only those who in complete solitude have themselves struggled through this period of doubt and search can, I think, form any adequate idea of the mental and spiritual anguish one suffers when, one by one, all the supports upon which one's relation to the Eternal seemed to have been built are shattered by the merciless logic of one's reason, when all firm ground seems to disappear from under one's feet, and one feels oneself hurling into an abyss of darkness and despair.

My mental sufferings were increased by yet another class of most disturbing doubts, which arose in my mind at that same period. Being then an officer of the Imperial Guards, my social activity drew me into direct participation in the evils of the existing State organisation; but the ethical aspect of Christ's teaching, which had always had a deep attraction for me, was by degrees disclosing itself more and more clearly to my understanding, and at last I got a glimpse of the practical consequences bound to ensue if men did indeed apply in their relations to one another the principle of love and brotherhood, in the simple and direct sense expressed in the teaching, the life and the death of Jesus. And this glimpse was sufficient to reveal to me how completely the life I was leading, as well as that of those around me, and, as far as I then knew, of all humanity—was contradicting Christ's Christianity. It appeared to me that mankind, although outwardly so ostentatiously exalting his teaching, not only refrained from practically realising it, but did not even theoretically recognise its true meaning. This observation, which was not shared by anyone around me, nor by anyone I then knew of, engendered in my mind the fear that I was losing my senses; for could it possibly be that of all men living and who had lived for the last 1800 years I was the only one to understand Christ correctly?

These two insurmountable—as they appeared to me—and yet unremovable difficulties utterly deprived me of all peace, haunting me day and night, until I indeed felt as if I was going mad. But the same power of truth which propelled me into this investigation eventually brought me safely through the abyss, as it is sure to do with every human soul in the same position, provided it be the truth only and the truth at any cost which is being sought. And when I at last again saw the light and rested my feet on firm ground, together with the peace of mind I attained I also had the joy of learning that I was not alone, but that there had been, and were, many men who had gone through similar experiences and been brought to the same conclusions.

As to what precisely these conclusions were I need not spend words to explain, for it will be sufficient to mention that my first or "abstract" difficulty was solved on lines which, as I have since learnt, Unitarian thinkers have as a body examined and expressed in the most conscientious, able and exhaustive manner. And my second or "practical" difficulty brought me to that understanding of the application of Christ's teaching to conduct which has been so clearly and so widely propagated of late years in the writings of Leo Tolstoy. Close personal friendship with him, the study of Unitarian and kindred literature, as well as intercourse with many minds advancing in the same direction, have, since I passed through my previous spiritual crisis, been of invaluable help to me in the further development of my consciousness. And having myself experienced the agonising ordeal of extricating oneself without any human help from the religious errors one has been brought up in, I naturally feel a deep desire to contribute, as far as in me lies, to the popularisation amongst my fellowmen of what has already been attained in this respect by the best representatives of liberal religious thought.

In Russia, chiefly owing to the Governmental and orthodox censorship of printed books, we are unfortunately altogether bereft of published literature presenting a free and rational investigation of religious matters; whereas, on the other hand, pseudo-scientific works of the purely materialistic school of thought enjoy a large circulation amongst the more educated classes. Consequently those, who, not satisfied with the coarsely superstitious form of Religion offered by the Orthodox Greek Church search for further enlightenment, find in Russian literature no help towards a more rational Religion, and generally either fall head foremost into the opposite extreme, i.e., into the equally groundless and dogmatical superstition of Atheism, or else fall back upon the primitive theology of the Church, concluding that reason and faith cannot possibly be reconciled, and that, therefore, the more illogical and senseless one's religion is, the likelier it is to be true, there being in it greater scope for faith and less danger of intrusion on the part of the carnal intellect—a point of view, which, as we all know, is not limited to any one country or group of believers.

Being at the present time in England, occupied with publishing in Russian and introducing into my country books printed irrespective of the Governmental censorship, I have included in these editions a series of works representing that rational attitude towards religious truths which is so powerfully developed in Unitarian literature. And I may here mention that it is with a feeling of deep gratitude and joy I have accepted some valuable help most kindly afforded me for this purpose by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

These publications will, I am quite certain, prove exceedingly useful in the cause of true religious enlightenment in Russia. And not only will the educated classes profit by them, but also the peasants and working men.

The average Russian peasant, owing to the Government's compulsory demands of conformity with the Church, and to the hypnotic influence of Church ceremonies, has a kind of idolatrous awe of those rites, images, relics, &c., which form the essential part of public worship in the Established Church, although during the last thirty years or so he is becoming much more indifferent to this formal, conventional, and grossly superstitious mode of worship. On the other hand, he has always had a deep sense of the true spirit of Christianity, and in his patient, forbearing, good-natured and industrious life offers for the most part a remarkable example of its practical realisation.

The contrast between his relations to the idolatrous Church theology artificially inculcated into him by the Government, and to the true Christian ideal is graphically manifested in the ancient Russian national proverbs on these subjects, in which the priests are always treated with disdain and contempt, whereas the Spirit of God and the teaching of Christ are invariably alluded to with the greatest reverence and approbation; and the sense of man's complete dependence upon the Higher Power is most touchingly insisted upon.

The moment the Russian peasant has the leisure and opportunity to think for himself, he inevitably assumes a critical attitude towards the State dogmas and senseless ritual of the official Church, and practically becomes what is termed a "Sectarian," but which really is a return to a purer and truer conception of the Christian teaching. Many "sects" of the most various kinds have thus developed in Russia, correspondingly to the different character of religious aspirations and external influences. At one time what is in England known as "Evangelical" propaganda was very active among the Russian working classes, owing in a great measure to influence from abroad. But of late a deeper and more independent development in the direction of a rational attitude towards religious questions has been pronouncing itself. It is most interesting and at times heart-rending to witness with what effort and difficulty individual peasant thinkers of this latter category, in their endeavours to extricate themselves from the traditional orthodox distortions of religious conceptions, have, quite alone, without any scientific culture, and merely by the help of their natural common sense, to travel over the whole of the controversial ground which sometimes offers such perplexing obstacles even to those of us who have had the advantage of profiting by the highest enlightenment attained by the collective human mind.

In this connection it is a characteristic fact that a community of so-called "sectarians," known under the name of "Doukhobors" (at present living in Canada), almost entirely illiterate, acquainted with the Christian teaching exclusively through oral tradition, and having up to quite lately possessed neither Bible nor Gospel in written form—that this religious community is in comparison with all other Russian "sects" endowed with the deepest spiritual insight into the Christian truth, and with a discernment of religious problems not always enjoyed by those who approach these problems through the medium of the written Book, where the dead letter is so apt to extinguish the live substance. It should also be remarked that it is these same "Doukhobors"—the most rational of religious communities—who are at the same time the most fearless, straightforward and consistent in the practical realisation in their conduct of the teaching of Christ, at times effecting in their individual and social life the nearest approach to the kingdom of God which has yet been attained on earth.

This group, however, forms a solitary exception in its complete freedom from all theological trammels, and the more fortunate they may appear to us in this respect, the greater sympathy and help do those other seekers after truth among the Russian people who do not enjoy these great advantages deserve on our part. It is, of course, impossible in the space of a few minutes to give, even in outline, any adequate idea of the position of progressive religious thought in Russia at the present time. And if I have allowed myself to touch at all upon this subject, it has been merely to emphasise the fact, that acquaintance with the results of Unitarian research and thought would, at the present juncture, afford the more advanced sections of the Russian people the greatest possible help in their efforts to extricate themselves from formal dogma and superstitious theology without at the same time surrendering their hold upon what they feel to be really valuable and essential in Religion, which many Atheist agitators would be so glad to see them do.

I would like to conclude by giving expression to a few thoughts which fill my mind in connection with the desirable further development of the bright and hopeful religious movement we are all participating in, each in his own particular way. We all, I trust, agree that a movement of this kind, if it be indeed vital, is essentially progressive; and that, therefore, it is destined to achieve in the unlimited future a yet greater degree of progress than has been attained in the past. Our object, consequently, on such occasions as the present one, I assume should not be restricted merely to the contemplation of the advantages already realised, which in itself undoubtedly affords a most lawful satisfaction and encouragement; but our eyes should also be directed towards the goal which has yet to be approached. And for this purpose it is well that we should not only congratulate one another on the merits and successes of the cause uniting us, but should also mutually unburden our sense of the shortcomings and inconsistencies, which it seems desirable in the future to overcome.

By whatever names we may designate our views—whether we call ourselves Christians or Atheists, Socialists or Anarchists, Ethicists, Humanitarians, or anything else—in one thing at any rate most of us do at the present day agree, and that is in accepting the idea of universal brotherhood or the mutual solidarity of the human race. This principle is most solemnly professed at all meetings for public worship; it is brilliantly dilated upon by progressive reformers of every kind, and enthusiastically applauded by their fascinated audiences.

While, however, finding such soothing satisfaction in its verbal proclamation, and being so keenly desirous of impressing on others its moral obligation, do we really grasp the actual bearing of this momentous truth we are so lavish in asseverating?

If we do not merely play with words, this principle implies neither more nor less than that we should treat absolutely every human being as we would wish to be treated ourselves, and as we do treat those nearest and dearest to us. We should consequently share all we have with any one who is in need of it, as we naturally would with our brother, parent or child, for whose welfare we are ready, if necessary, to sacrifice our all. Were our attitude towards our fellowmen really such, it is obvious that, with the extreme want and destitution surrounding us, we should very soon find ourselves surrendering the possession of all our property and reduced to the same level as our penniless neighbours.

As a matter of fact, however, we are not doing this, nor are we even desirous of becoming capable of so doing. We should shrink with terror and dismay at the very idea of the inevitable and seemingly disastrous consequences such conduct would involve for ourselves and those we love.

This being so, it is, I think, most important that we should at least have the courage to face the truth and candidly recognise our glaring inconsistency, however humiliating and painful such a confession may be to us. Indeed, the more uncomfortable and miserable we may in consequence become the better will it be, seeing that progress is possible only in so far as one is dissatisfied with one's present condition.

Should this consciousness of having so much to develop and reform in ourselves somewhat suppress the fervour of our efforts at improving others, we need not be cast down, for the more genuine earnestness and the less self-deception and cant will there be; and what may appear to be lost in the scope of our social activity will assuredly be gained in the sincerity of our motives and the intensity of our action.

And it is this, after all, which is the most essential: the intrinsic value, as well as the influence for good of our lives, ultimately depending not so much on what we preach as on what we are.

It is, of course, unnecessary to add that were we to develop in ourselves this Christian attitude towards all our fellow men, as towards our nearest relatives, prisons and workhouses, law-courts and gallows, armies and police, class privileges and capitalistic advantages, individual ownership of land and of the instruments of production, and all other iniquities of the kind, would vanish from our lives, together with the injustice, suffering, misery and hatred they represent and produce; for we should become as incapable of participating in all these evils in relation to any one as we now are of introducing them into the circle of our families.

In the time of the abolition of slavery in America, if I am rightly informed, of all religious denominations it was some of the members of the Unitarian Church who were almost the only representatives of any religious body who had the courage and sincerity to stand out in favour of the oppressed race. And now that the time has come for the liberation of the working masses from the not less atrocious economical and political slavery of our days, is it too much to desire and to hope that the representatives of modern Unitarianism will act up to the high social standard they so gloriously attained in the past? At all events it is certainly the sacred duty of every individual who accepts Christ as his master, and wishes to be true to his spirit, to study, appreciate and support that progressive humanitarian movement which is now so universally and authoritatively manifesting itself in the various branches of advanced reform. It would indeed be sad and humiliating were the spirit of Christ's teaching to be imperceptibly transferred from his acknowledged followers to those who nominally repudiate him, but in practice are the most active promulgators of right and just relations between men; and were we, who profess the Christian ideal, to find ourselves merely conquerors of abstract theological error, cut off from participation in the practical social progress of mankind.

Approach towards unity is the direction which all true mental and spiritual progress of mankind inevitably takes. Unity is the ideal which one naturally more especially associates with the particular movement which has accepted the designation of Unitarian, if this term be understood in its larger meaning. Unitarianism has in the past rendered humanity so enormous a service towards the unification of religion by liberating universal truth from the net of irrational and mutually antagonistic superstitions it was entangled in, that one naturally longs to see Unitarianism in the future render in the domain of feeling the same service it has hitherto rendered in the sphere of reason, by participation in the levelling of all those egotistical barriers which prevent men from behaving towards other men as the children of one heavenly Father inevitably would, if only they did indeed realise the brotherhood which unites them.

Thanking this assembly of fellow men and fellow seekers after truth for having allowed me to express myself, I earnestly hope that no one will deem it out of place that speaking in a country which enjoys complete freedom of speech, and addressing a religious body distinguished, above all others, by the independence of thought it encourages, I have allowed myself frankly to give vent to that which was uppermost in my mind on the present occasion.

EDUCATION is the chief business of the nation, for everything depends upon it. True education is the full and harmonious development of the child from the cradle to maturity, so that it may grow up to be actually all that it is by nature capable of being.—Charles Hargrove.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

THE annual meeting of this Association, held on Tuesday morning, May 28, at the King's Hall, Holborn, we have already briefly chronicled, and have published an abstract of the annual report. What we propose now is to record some of the speeches at the meeting.

The adoption of the report, moved by the President, the Rev. H. ENFIELD DOWSON, was seconded by the Rev. L. DE B. KLEIN, and supported by the Revs. W. G. TARRANT, L. G. WILSON (Hopedale, Mass.), and J. J. WRIGHT.

Dr. KLEIN, referring to the historical sketch with which the report opened, showing the progress of the Association from its foundation in May, 1834, up to the present time, when there were 281 schools making returns, with 3,600 teachers and nearly 33,000 scholars, said that it was a study in evolution, telling how great things grew out of small beginnings—an encouraging lesson which they all needed. But while they had been so successful in point of numbers, in their publications, and in other matters, there might be certain points in the work still awaiting development. The great aim of their schools must now be the true religious education of the children, according to the highest ideals and the most enlightened conceptions. It was religion that must be taught, not the history of the Jews, or the geography of Palestine or Egypt, or even the history of religion. Those things ministered to the study of religion, but they were not religion. A mechanical study of the prophets, and of the letter of religion, might be as little helpful as bondage to a creed. Religion is the life of the soul, which is expressed in the moralities of which the soul is capable; therefore they must teach morality in its highest form, steeped in reverence, with noble ideals inspired by the greatest minds. In their teaching of the Bible they must face the fact that as minds and visions have enlarged, so must the teaching of religion to their children be enlarged. They must teach their teachers, and in that connection he was deeply grateful for all the interest that had been shown in the work of the Oxford Summer School. Their teaching must be from the beginning progressive, representing a true orderly progress in the mind of the child, taking up the aspects of life calculated to make the child a true citizen, truly religious, realising the connection between the facts of life and the principles of religion. Then with the widening of thought and of the heart they would be able to see beyond all sectional aims to the glorious conception of a church co-extensive with mankind, and worthy to be called the Church of Humanity.

The Rev. W. G. TARRANT spoke of the admirable work of the Day School, not only in giving secular education but in exerting influence on character; but still the work of the Sunday-school was needed, and they must realise that they were engaged in nothing less than the ministry of Christ, of the Gospel to children. If there was teaching and consolation in their ministry to grown-up people, so must it be to the children. It was a blessed thing to be brought into contact with humanity in its earliest stages, to assist the bud to open, to help God's sunshine to touch the young life.

The Rev. L. G. WILSON tendered the cordial greetings of the American Sunday School Society, and spoke of the close community of aim, and the mutual obligations in the matter of literature, which united the schools of the two countries.

The Rev. J. J. WRIGHT spoke of the growing difficulty of Sunday-school work, because of the higher duties now laid upon them. Their ideal of religious education was to train their young people in the art of doing right in relation to others, to their country and other countries, to Nature and to God. The need was very great, and never was more attention given to that cultivation of character than in the present time. Many of their teachers were longing and praying to be more able to give their scholars a sense of God, of His good laws, to make them feel the joy of duty and the charm of Christ-likeness. Even when they had the best apparatus, they knew that only by their own mind and heart and soul could any good result be produced. Only mind could educate mind, heart touch heart and soul influence soul.

The appointment of the officers and committee, with the Right Hon. Lady O'Hagan as President, was moved by the Rev. W. NAPIER, and seconded by the Rev. T. A. THOMAS, who gave interesting particulars as to the schools in Ireland and Wales respectively.

The welcome to representatives of affiliated and kindred societies was moved from the chair, and response was made by the Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL, who, at the annual meeting fifty years ago, had responded to a similar resolution, and by the Rev. E. MONTET, D.D., of Geneva, who warmly acknowledged the welcome accorded to the foreign visitors, and spoke of the close sympathy which united those who were pledged to the liberal movement in religion in different countries.

Addresses were then given by the PRESIDENT on "Retrospect," and by the Rev. C. J. STREET and Miss MARIAN PRITCHARD on "Outlook." These addresses, we understand, are to be included in the volume of The Helper for 1902, which is to be edited by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant.

THE PRESIDENT'S "RETROSPECT."

Looking back over the history of Sunday-schools in this country, he described the condition of the children of the masses, when the compassion of Robert Raikes was stirred on their behalf, poor little drudges, in their scanty leisure left to idleness and barbarism. There had been Sunday-schools before, such as Cardinal Borromeo's in Italy in the sixteenth century and Theophilus Lindsey's and Mrs. Cappe's earlier in the eighteenth century, but the general movement began with the school established by Raikes at Gloucester in 1780, and rapidly spread from the Church of England to other religious bodies. Adam Smith and Cowper bore testimony to their value, and John Wesley wrote in 1784, "I find these schools springing up wherever I go," and three years later, "These schools will be one great means of reviving religion throughout the kingdom."

None took up the work of Sunday-schools more earnestly than our own forefathers, and a number of school centenaries have recently been celebrated. A great work was done in providing the elements of education, and in our schools the line was never sharply drawn between religious and secular teaching. The influence of the teacher's character was the great thing, and the teaching of the first elements of reading and writing was a truly religious work. He recalled the memory of Travers Madge as an ideal Sunday-school teacher. Methods and subjects of instruction were as the small dust of the balance compared with the real thing, which was a spirit like that of Travers Madge, a Christ-like spirit. And now, when there was no longer need for them to teach the elements of education, and they could give their whole attention to the culture of mind and soul, seeking to impart enlightened knowledge of religion, of the Bible, of Nature and of God, there was more need than ever for them to realise the importance of character, and the highest kind of personal influence. There was a tendency among teachers and scholars to take things easily, and to place relaxation before high culture and effort of mind and spirit to rise to higher life. It was part of the spirit of an age given over to luxury and pleasure, without the grit of their fathers; and they must gird up the loins of their minds afresh. They had a splendid lead from the Association in the matter of literature, and teachers must take up their work with fresh zeal and application, realising the fresh inspiration to be found in the Bible, and above all in discipleship to Jesus of Nazareth. Their great aim was to exert the best personal influence over the children, and this they would achieve as they realised that the knowledge of Jesus was not out of date, but that to know him as he was, and to come under his living touch was the most vital need of their moral and spiritual life.

THE REV. C. J. STREET'S "OUTLOOK."

The annual report, he said, showed a falling-off in the number of scholars, and especially of those over sixteen years of age. It was a tendency deplored by all religious bodies, and it must rouse them in the new century to set their house in order, and make the schools too attractive to be forsaken. The inheritance of the past left them a unique opportunity, but their schools must be adapted to the needs of the new time.

The Sunday-school was the Church's way of influencing the young for good, and he mentioned four directions in which improvement was needed. (1) More system in the lessons, from the infants up to the adults. Much valuable energy was wasted from the lack of continuity in the teaching. (2) The teaching must be brought into closer touch with daily life, to lead the young, in the name of religion, to take a vital interest in all matters affecting the welfare of the community, and questions that go to the root of daily life. (3) The whole atmosphere of the school must be religious, with a happy sense that everything was done to the glory of God and for the advancement of His kingdom. (4) They must develop the independent life of the scholars, and teach them to think for themselves.

The Sunday-school of the twentieth century, as he conceived it, would lay the chief stress upon character and conduct, making the children feel that personality was the greatest gift of God to man and the central fact of religion. It would lead them to a sense of God's immanence and direct relationship to every individual soul. It would make them feel the sacredness and dignity of life. Following in the line of the philanthropic zeal of the last century, it would teach the rising generation the claims and rights of other human souls on their attention and love. The great lessons of the Brotherhood of Humanity would be pressed home, and the supreme joy to be found in sacrifice. There would be distinctive theological teaching, rational and based on the eternal facts of human nature, that would be an adequate embodiment and protection of the religious spirit; and this Bible (at last discovered) would take a more important place than ever in the teaching of the future. The glorious personality of Jesus, emerging as never before from the pages of the New Testament, would become with new graciousness the possession of humanity, the seal of its promise, the prophecy of its immortal destiny in union with the Divine. Science would be treated as the handmaiden of God, and social problems would be frankly faced and faithfully discussed in the higher classes, as matters with which living religion was bound to deal. And finally the school would deliberately make itself into a training school for the church, preparation classes leading the young people every year to enter into the larger fellowship of the congregation. So the school would retain the elder scholars at the most critical period, and would give to the young a new and living interest in the things which touch them most nearly.

MISS MARIAN PRITCHARD'S ADDRESS.

Our President has taken a "backward looking glance" over the Sunday-school of the past. Mr. Street, in his speech on the Outlook, has urged that our methods need readaptation from time to time in order that this important institution may be better able to meet its changing conditions. I, too, have been asked to speak on Our Outlook.

A few weeks ago I had the privilege of visiting the collection of pictures by Spanish artists now on loan at the Guildhall. In the first room, placed above the little gallery, I saw one picture that struck me with great interest, both for its own sake and because, as a sort of parable picture, it seemed to focus within itself some of the thoughts to which I wanted to give expression at our meeting to-day.

The picture is called "The Chair of Philip II.," the chair being a rough seat hewn out of the rocky summit of a high hill, overlooking the plain where stands the Escurial—palace and monastery. It was the habit of the King to go up this mount in order to overlook the great building then in course of erection; and the picture shows the King seated there while his minister, scroll in hand, reads an account of the progress of the work. Dark thundery clouds are gathered over the plain below; but above, the light is breaking through, bathing the hill-top with a soft and beautiful radiance.

Does not this picture suggest a parable for us, for are we not all concerned with the building of the "living Temple of God"? Idle passers-by may, and often do, wonder at the trouble we are giving ourselves, and even grumble at the dust and turmoil. "Why can't you let the things alone?" they cry; "the plain looked much better as it was." Well, perhaps if these idlers would allow themselves even to be carried (as was the King) up the mountain, they might yet be able to discern, among the dust and seeming confusion, some signs that would at least show promise of a worthy edifice.

But, friends, we are not this morning concerned with the passers-by, but with ourselves, some of the lowly labourers striving to help in this heavenly building. Sometimes we grow dissatisfied; life is so short and our powers so feeble; the one tiny brick which we can hope to place is so unimportant; we strive and strive, and after all, what a little building up results; shall we not lay down our tools and give up altogether?

Lay down our tools for a little while? Yes, perhaps, but give up, never! We are but a little tired and need to be refreshed. So let us mount the high hill, and breathe the pure air; let us go in company, and in this "together-hood" look down over our work, gathering counsel, encouragement and hope from one another.

The dark cloud may be for the moment over our work, but above the light is breaking through and falling over the hill-top, which now in truth becomes for us a Mount of Transfiguration. May this week be thus symbolised in our hearts!

And further. It is good to go up aloft in order to see how our work fits in with its surrounding parts. For although, when occupied with our daily labours on the plain, we are able to note what lies just under our hand, yet it is only by mounting from time to time and looking upon the work from above, that we can see how our portion fits in with the rest and where it requires modification or remodelling.

What, then, have we to learn from such an outlook as we have been able to take during the past century? Many things, of course, but I should like to lay stress upon three of these.

First, students of all branches of scientific thought, whether of philosophy or natural science, are finding out and teaching us more clearly than ever that everything is governed by law, and that the day will come when the word "chance" will have no place in our language. Therefore we must strive to set our lives in harmony with these laws; we must learn ourselves, and we must teach our children, to be obedient to the divine must; mark, I say divine must; for the human must is oft-times the divine must not! and the saying "Whatever a man sows that also shall he reap" will be recognised as words of veritable hope and of warning, too.

Second, noting the divine patience displayed in the working out of the laws which govern the universe we shall strive also after that spirit of patience, through the lack of which so much of our work in the past has been hasty, imperfect, and even mischievous.

And thirdly. The knowledge that the universe is governed by law, and that that law is beneficent, leads us to the ever deepening conviction that Love and Wisdom are at the root of all things, and these are enshrined in our thoughts of God, our Heavenly Father. This simple faith in God is uplifting, full of joy and cheer; and I hold that he who, while professing such belief yet persistently looks to the gloomy side of things, is untrue to his profession; for surely—as our friend, Mr. Horton, President of our S. S. Association in America, whom we should have so gladly welcomed among us to-day, has well said—"He that hath a sunny faith should let his light shine."

Let us take heart, then, let us be joyful in the Lord, in our work and in our whole life. And when clouds are dark and gloomy, as they often are, around our heads or around those of our friends, our faith in God will help us, and we shall look sunward, and with faces golden,

Speak to each other softly of a hope.

So, toiling, rejoicing, sorrowing, onward through life we shall go, leading our scholars, and our scholars leading us, until the time comes for us each to lay down our tools; but feeling sure that the building will still go on until at last the Divine edifice of God, the Living Temple of Humanity, will be completed, and all creation shall cry aloud "Behold it is very good."

Kemp, 10s. 6d.; Mr. W. Spiller, £5; Miss S. E. Cooper, 10s. 6d.; Mr. John Warren, £1 1s.; Miss Warren, £1 1s.; Mrs. Evans, 10s.; Mrs. W. G. Harrison, £2 2s.; Mrs. Haynes, 10s.; Mrs. Wood, 10s. 6d.; Miss Tripe, 10s. 6d.

SCOTTISH UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

AT a well-attended meeting of the Committee of the above Association, held at Glasgow last week, Mr. JAMES GRAHAM, president, gave his report on his visit to the Twentieth Century Meetings as the Association delegate, and received the thanks of the Committee. Thereafter the secretary, Mr. SEMPLE, read the correspondence which had passed between Mr. Bowie and himself on the subject of the representation of this Association on the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, which was followed by considerable discussion. The Committee unanimously resolved to record their disappointment that the Scottish Association still remains unrepresented. The position of Scotland in the councils of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association was felt to be invidious and ridiculous in view of the fact that a very large sum of money was yearly expended in Scotland without consultation with the Association there—a policy entirely inconsistent with the terms of Mr. McQuaker's will. It was resolved that the Committee take all possible means to have the above anomaly rectified. The Committee also considered an important offer from the Free Christian Church at Kilmarnock, in pursuance of a resolution of the congregation that the site and buildings in Clerk's-lane should be "sold absolutely to the Scottish Unitarian Association for £650, plus expense of sale and transfer, with immediate entry."

It was unanimously agreed that this offer be accepted, and that steps be at once taken to affect a legal transfer of the buildings. The new trustees will be the president, secretary, and treasurer of the Scottish Unitarian Association. The Kilmarnock Standard of June 9, referring to the change in owership of the Clerk's Lane Church, added the following historical note:—

> Originally a church of the Secession body, it was the scene of Dr. Morison's expulsion and the starting point of the Evangelical Union—Dr. Bathgate, Mr. Black, and Mr. Hislop, Mr. Borland (now parish minister of Yarrow), and Mr. Forrest (now of the Unitarian Church Glasgow), following Dr. Morison in the E.U. ministry in Clerk's Lane. In 1886 Mr. Forrest and the congregation withdrew from the Union, and it began an independent career under the designation "Free Christian Church." On Mr. Forrest taking up the M'Quaker Lectureship in 1890, he was succeeded in Clerk's Lane by Mr. Alex. Webster, who, after a few years' residence here, returned to Aberdeen, his successors being Mr. Scott and Mr. Henderson. At present the congregation is without a settled minister.

PUBLIC opinion expresses what men will to do: not their inward perceptions. All kinds of crimes have been countenanced by public opinion, in some age or nation, but we cannot as easily show how far they were sustained by reason and conscience in each individual. Coleridge defines public opinion as "the average prejudices of the community." Woe unto those who have no safer guide of principles and practice than this "average of prejudices." Feeble wanderers are they, following a flickering Jack-a-lantern, when there is a calm, bright pole-star, for ever above the horison, to guide their steps, if they would but look to it.—Mrs. Child.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"OUR YOUNGEST BROTHER."

SIR,—None who were at Essex Hall on the morning of May 30 will have forgotten the charming little speech of Miss Westenholz about "our youngest brother," the little Unitarian Congregation at Copenhagen. Since coming home, I have read in the organ of that body, "Lys over Landet," the report of the first annual general meeting of this "Free Church Association," held on the 18th of the month. There I read that the congregation had just succeeded in engaging for three years a room in the building of the Students' Association. The expenditure for the year was about £116 including the pastor's stipend, and the income about £118. The new quarters are rented at about £16 a year, and the Committee consider the financial outlook satisfactory. A charge, however, has to be made for admission to the services, and it was felt that it would be a very great gain if this could be dispensed with. Passing from finance, the meeting proceeded to discuss the "programme" of the Society, and finally agreed, almost unanimously, on the following:—

"The Free Church Association" has for its object:

1. To establish Christian Congregations in this country which shall acknowledge faith in the Father, the only true God, and labour to promote such acknowledgment either within or without the Church of the People.

2. To work for the spread of religious enlightenment by voice and pen, in part by the holding of weekly religious services, as opportunity occurs by lectures, and eventually by the publication of tracts of a free-thinking, undogmatic, and religious tenour.

"The Free Church Association" is not bound by any fixed Confession of Faith, but offers a welcome to all who sympathise with our object and are willing to unite with us in the worship of God and the service of Man in the spirit of Jesus and in the love of Truth.

The meeting subsequently discussed the raising of a special fund for the purchase of an organ and other purposes. Miss Westenholz announced that she had opened an account in the name of the Society at the bank, and she invited small contributions from time to time. It was stated that an organ could be bought for about £16, and this amount was promptly offered on loan, but our friend "set herself against buying the organ before they had the money, and would have nothing to do with borrowing it."

The first service in the new quarters was attended by about 200 persons, and Pastor Birkedal preached a sermon full of encouragement and hope.

As I hope to have the great pleasure of visiting "our youngest brother" next month I have thought that some of your readers might like to send by me some little offering of goodwill. It would be very pleasant, at any rate, to tell our friends that it would be a privilege to us to help them with the organ. Any well-wishers who will do me the honour of making me their messenger must be so good as to write to me in the course of next week. I will gladly take charge of shillings and half-crowns.

A PILGRIMAGE TO CATTERICK.

SIR,—Fifty-two years ago—on August 28, 1849—there was a "pilgrimage" of North of England Unitarians to Catterick, near Richmond, in Yorkshire, "in commemoration of the excellent Theophilus Lindsey," who resigned the living of Catterick in 1774 and proceeded to London, where he instituted the Essex-street Chapel (now Essex Hall), the first distinctively Unitarian place of worship in London. The hundred members who composed the party assembled at Richmond, and after visiting the Castle, a relic of feudal times and once the abode of a princely and powerful race, allied both by blood and marriage to the Royal Family of England, wended their way along the lovely Swale to the interesting and extensive ruins of Easby Abbey, originally founded in the twelfth century and inhabited by "White Canons." Strolling further to Catterick they gathered in a long room abutting the burial ground, and held their commemoration service. Mr. Brown, who was mainly responsible for the Barnard Castle Unitarian Church; the Rev. Wm. Turner, then eighty-seven years of age; the Rev. Geo. Harris, of Newcastle; the Rev. Mr. Frankland, of Malton; the Revs. J. C. Meek and James M'Dowell, of Stockton; the Rev. Mr. Wright, of Sunderland; and the Rev. Mr. Ryland, and other gentlemen whose names are still familiar to Unitarians in the North, were prominent in the interesting proceedings. The Rev. Wm. Turner was a link with the past. He remembered the Rev. Theophilus Lindsey, his wife, and Miss Harrison, who later married the Rev. N. Cappe, minister of St. Saviourgate Chapel, York, making their first call after bidding farewell to Catterick, at his father's house in Wakefield.

Visiting Catterick recently the two members, whose names are subjoined, found a lady there who well remembered the "pilgrimage." Catterick has not changed much since that time, and it has many other historical associations that render it interesting. The Tees Side Committee of Churches, as being nearest, are anxious to repeat the "pilgrimage" next month, and wish to take advantage of the publicity afforded by this paper to invite friends from all parts of England to join. Saturday, July 13, has been selected as the date of the pilgrimage, since on that day, from all parts of the north, the "pilgrims" may travel to and fro for a single fare. Many prominent ministers are being invited and expect to be present, and the Rev. Frank Walters, of Newcastle, has promised to read a paper on "The Character and Influence of Theophilus Lindsey." The programme will include visits to several places of interest and the scenery around Richmond is too well known for its beauty to require more than passing reference.

A substantial meat tea will be provided at about 1s. 6d. per head at Catterick, and, so far as is practicable, the proceedings of fifty-two years ago will be repeated. The Tees Side Committee of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Association are anticipating representatives from all parts, and later the Editor of this paper will be asked to afford a little space for further details. But in the meantime it is hoped that friends in all districts, particularly throughout Yorkshire, will be pleased to apply for full particulars to SIR,—I shall be much obliged if you will allow me to announce in your columns that Mr. Oldland, of Piccadilly House, Westcliffe, Southend-on-Sea, has kindly consented to act as local hon. secretary for Bernard Cottage—the Seaside Home presented to the London Sunday School Society by Mrs. Bayle Bernard in 1899—in the place of Mr. R. Ewart Crane, resigned.

The attention of superintendents, teachers, &c., in our London Sunday-schools is specially called to this change.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Aberystwyth.—"One of the best festivals we have yet had," was the general verdict of those who were present at the tenth musical festival of the Unitarians of Cardiganshire. As a rule, it is held in rotation at one of our own chapels; but this year it had been decided to hold it at Aberystwyth; and there it was held on the 10th inst. The choirs, which numbered thirteen, accompanied by a large number of friends and sympathisers, were conveyed thither by two special excursion trains from Lampeter and Llandyssul. But before reaching the train, by far the greater number of them had to start from their homes as early as five or six in the morning, and had to be conveyed in brakes or other conveyances to the station. It says much for the enthusiasm of our people, which becomes especially evident on great occasions such as this, as well as for the completeness of the arrangements, that everything should have turned out so successfully and satisfactorily. The festival was held in a large hall, capable of seating about 800 people comfortably; and soon after eleven, when the service was advertised to commence, it was quite full, a large number being unable to find sitting accommodation. The President was the Rev. W. James, B.A., J.P., who delivered an interesting address, in which he gave a sketch of the history of the festival; and the Rev. Gwilym Evans, B.A., of Manchester College, acted as conductor. The service was introduced by the Rev. J. Davies, by reading a portion of scripture and prayer. Mr. Davies also delivered a short address. In all, seven tunes, two children's tunes, and two anthems (all in Welsh) were rendered in such magnificent style, and with such thrilling effect, as fully justified the verdict already quoted.

Croft.—The anniversary sermons were preached on Sunday last, afternoon and evening, by the Rev. A. H. Dolphin, of Leigh. Large numbers of friends came from Warrington (the Warrington choir kindly taking the musical part of the service), from Leigh, Chowbent, Hindley, Park-lane, and other places, so that not only was the chapel filled, but many listened from the graveyard. Tea was partaken of in the barn as usual by nearly 200 persons, and the collection amounted to £13 6s., which was considerably more than last year.

Edinburgh.—The Literary Society of St. Mark's Chapel had their annual outing to North Queensferry on Saturday, June 8. On their arrival friends from Kirkcaldy joined the party, and all spent a most enjoyable time together; the weather being brilliantly fine, added to the success of the picnic, which was unanimously pronounced one of the best the Society has had.

Hinckley.—The congregation had the pleasure on Sunday week of once more welcoming their friend, the Rev. N. Jozan, of Buda-Pesth. Mr. Jozan preached to a large congregation, and in the afternoon read to the Sunday-school and other friends the paper on "Hungarian Folk-Lore," which he had prepared for the International Council meeting in London.

Liverpool: North End Mission.—Mr. D. Delta Evans, who, since its inception in 1895, has been closely identified with the Welsh Unitarian movement in London, and until recently conducted the Welsh services in Essex Hall, has accepted an appointment as Assistant Missionary at the North End Domestic Mission, and will enter on his duties early in July. Mr. Evans, who was brought up as a Calvinistic Methodist, has published several tracts and pamphlets, both in Welsh and English, and a volume of essays, noticed at the time of publication in these columns.

London: Highgate.—On Whit-Sunday a somewhat unusual service was held in the Sunday-school. In order to enable all the teachers and senior scholars to attend the aggregate service at Essex Hall on the afternoon of that day, Mr. T. Elliot, one of the members of the church, was asked to give an address to all the younger scholars. He proposed holding a "Toy Service," which was successfully carried out. Each child brought a toy, and these gifts were arranged on tables in front of the platform, and afterwards conveyed to Winifred House and the Islington Workhouse Schools, to be distributed amongst the children. The address took the form of a fairy tale, a wooden horse relating his own life story in a most fascinating manner, and at the same time weaving in most valuable lessons for both old and young.

North-East Lancashire Sunday School Union.—On Sunday, June 9, the fourth annual United Service, in which all the schools of the Union are invited to take part, was held at Newchurch. The weather proving fine, a large congregation met in the chapel at three o'clock. Service was conducted by the Rev. F. W. Emms, of Rawtenstall, and special hymns from the Manchester Association's collection were sung. The address was given by Mr. Charles Wright, of Longsight, himself an old Newchurch Sunday scholar, and was listened to attentively by young and old. Mr. Wright's remarks, based upon the two words "Work and Win," part of the refrain of a hymn he remembered since his early days, were partly reminiscent, and it was interesting to hear of the early struggles of his brother, the Rev. J. J. Wright, now so well known amongst our little people in connection with "Young Days." The necessity of real, downright, earnest work, if we would reach any success worth the name, was insisted on and well illustrated by a number of stories. Tea was afterwards served in the school to the friends from the neighbouring schools, most of whom had walked considerable distances over the hills which surround Newchurch to be present at the service. A collection was made in aid of the Twentieth Century Fund of the Manchester District Sunday School Association.

Stannington.—On Whit-Monday the children of the Sunday-school met as usual about two o'clock, and after parading the village singing appropriate hymns at intervals, had tea in the schoolroom, with about 100 friends, teachers, &c., after which the evening was spent in a field, kindly lent by Mr. G. H. Revett. On Sunday, June 2, the anniversary services were held, when two eloquent and impressive sermons were preached by the Rev. J. E. Manning, M.A., of Sheffield. The congregations were large, but the collections on behalf of the school somewhat disappointing.

("The Biarritz of Wales")
Is highly recommended for invalids. It possesses the most equable temperature, its shore being swept by the Gulf Stream and the S.W. breezes of the Atlantic. The drainage is perfect, and the town is supplied with the purest water from Plynlimmon. The late Sir James Clarke, M.P., says: "A fortnight in Aberystwyth is equivalent to a month's residence in most watering places.' Guides on application to the Town Clerk.

Hospital Sunday.

The majority of Contributions to the Hospital Sunday Fund presumably desire to relieve human suffering, not to inflict pain on helpless animals. Yet to a number of those Hospitals which benefit by this Fund laboratories are attached, where, at a great expense, vast hordes of animals are daily and painfully experimented on.

The indifference to suffering which such experiments occasion in the minds of those performing them, has, moreover, been clearly established by vivisectors themselves (see their evidence on this subject before the Royal Commission).

Persons who place humanity before science, and who desire to relieve suffering and not occasion it, should therefore withhold their gifts on Sunday from the following leading Hospitals which have laboratories (i.e., torture chambers for animals) attached to them:—

Charing Cross Hospital.
Guy's Hospital.
London Hospital.
Middlesex Hospital.
St. Bartholomew's Hospital.
St. Thomas's Hospital.
St. Mary's Hospital.

Further information and suggestions on this painful subject will be gladly supplied by the Secretary of the above Society, WHICH APPEALS TO THE PUBLIC FOR AID.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

AT the recent meeting of the London Diocesan Conference, a resolution asking for a re-translation of the Athanasian Creed was met by an amendment, moved by Canon Armitage Robinson, to the effect that no re-translation would meet the objection to the compulsory use of this creed on certain days in the public services of the Church. The present version, he said, "admirably represents the meaning of the original framers of the formula" :—

The intention of the Church of the fifth century was to condemn in the severest language those who departed by a hair's breadth from a certain intellectual standard of doctrine, which she had laboriously elaborated as a safe-guard against heresies, and for which she had shed blood—her own as well as of others. The temper of the time is photographically reproduced in those magnificent anathemas. No translation can soften what was meant to be as hard as adamant.

And later in the same speech, to justify the repetition of the damnatory clauses in religious services, he said, for himself :—

I sing them as part of a great hymn, composed as a battle-song of the Church at the moment when at length she was vanquishing the Arians and other depravers of the Faith. I sing them as I sing certain portions of the Psalms which are wholly unchristian in their temper. I have no authority to pick and choose; I have no desire to disobey.

Yet he longed for the time when he might be allowed to sing only the theological part of the Creed, in which he thoroughly believed, without at the same time threatening his neighbour; so his plea was that it might be lawful to omit the damnatory clauses, though they might be kept in square brackets as of historical interest. Canon Henson seconded the amendment, and the Rev. C. Faulkner, in support, said that the Creed was out of harmony with the Prayer Book, and another speaker suggested that it would be better received in Latin. Then, on the motion of Prebendary Wace, the "previous question" was carried by a large majority; but the Guardian applauds Canon Robinson, agreeing that no re-translation would meet the widespread objection of earnest churchmen to the damnatory clauses, and pointing to the only two possible modes of giving relief. Either the recitation of the Creed should be abandoned, as has been done by the American Church and the Church of Ireland, or the damnatory clauses should be eliminated. Of these two courses, the Guardian follows Canon Robinson in preferring the latter.

THE address given by the Rev. Stopford Brooke on Sunday evening, March 31, at the United Service in the Town Hall, in connection with the Twentieth Century Celebration by Birmingham Unitarians, has now been published, and may be had (price 2d.) from the Midland Educational Company, Corporation-street, Birmingham. The address, of which we published a report at the time of its delivery, has for subject, "The Temper of the Soul in which we should survey the Past, live in the Present, and resolve for the Future." Looking forward into the new century, we are, Mr. Brooke said, like colonists on the frontier of a new land, which is to be occupied. Many things are uncertain, and we cannot tell what the future may bring. But of one thing we may be certain :—

One thing we can secure. We may make certain of the temper of our soul; we may secure the ideas with their principles and their duties, with which we shall go forward into the unknown. We may make the temper of the soul magnanimous, loving, just, free, pitiful and courteous; full of hope for mankind, ready for sacrifice of self; kindled with faith in God as the Father of our great Brotherhood; steady in the following of the life of Jesus Christ. It is on our doing this that the new life of the Future, with which the Present is now travailing, depends for its growth, its character and its happiness, and a deep responsibility for it lies on us, citizens of the great people to which we belong. When we attain that noble temper for the sake of our country we attain it for the sake of the human race, and we ought to hold that larger aim in view. When we attain it with that impersonal motive we best attain and secure it for our own inner life. And in thus attaining it I maintain that fully one half of religion is contained.

MR. BROOKE then spoke of our debt to the past and of the need of wisdom and reverence in appreciating its gifts, and discriminating between what must be kept and what laid aside. The self-sacrifice, the truth, the faith and courage of our fathers must be maintained; what they did for national good and freedom must be held in honour, if we would fully understand what is worthy of reverence and admiration in the present.

We see, as we look on the great doings and lives of the past, that mere wealth and luxury, big commerce and great possessions, cleverness in getting the better of our rivals, wars for conquest and cash, haughty isolation from other nations, are not, as so many think, the greatness of a nation, but its decay and its corruption; and we resolve to stand firm in our private life and in our lives as citizens against this false conception of greatness. We cherish and practise the faith that our own greatness of soul and the greatness of England abide and are secured not in these outward things, but in the character of God, living in the character of our people; that self-sacrifice and honour, heroism and courage, high hope and unswerving faith, obedience to the moral law, aspiration to the perfect in God, are the roots and the fruitage of national greatness. Look back and feel, if you would influence the present and the future, the life-blood of the noble deeds, thoughts, and character of England tingling in your veins. In that, feel your unity with your fellow-citizens; from that, draw inspiration for the present and courage for the future.

The address then spoke of the honourable past and the great traditions of our own religious community, and drew out the lines of the ideal for our faithful service in the present, if the future is to be true to the past. It is needless to say that the whole address is worthy of the serious attention of our people, and we trust that its eloquent appeal will be widely read and taken to heart.

AMONG the many business letters which reach Essex Hall, there are often expressions of sincere gratitude for the light and guidance afforded by the books and pamphlets which are issued. In a letter received the other day a lady correspondent thus expressses herself :—"I am exceedingly grateful to you for the pamphlets, from which I have derived great joy and comfort. Although I see quite clearly that my general line of thought has been tending gradually to the point at which I now stand, it seems as if I am now as it were born into a new life; and it is impossible for me adequately to describe the ecstasy of spiritual joy combined with quiet peace and comfort which I realise." She adds that if the words she has written are of use to anyone else, they may be used, and we are glad to give them publicity.

THE PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF LANCASHIRE AND CHESHIRE.

THE annual meetings of the Assembly were held at Oldham on Thursday, June 13. A religious service was conducted in Lord-street Unitarian Church, in the morning, by the Rev. H. S. TAYLER, M.A., and the Rev. R. T. HERFORD, B.A., preached the sermon. He based his address upon the words, "He sought to see Jesus, who he was," St. Luke, xix. 3. The subject, he said, had taken hold of him in late years with ever-increasing force. "Back to Jesus" was a phrase often heard of late, and he held that something more was implied by those words than the substitution of the scriptures for tradition. Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, or Paul might be invaluable guides, but to go back to Jesus, if it was possible, was to go back to the real Jesus as he was before, for instance, Paul was converted. The fact that we had never seen him could not be alleged as a reason why we were debarred from a knowledge of him as he was; we were in some respects even better off that the New Testament writers, though, of course, we were dependent on what was recorded in the New Testament. The sayings of Jesus were, so far as they went, his own witness to himself, and, indeed, went much further than at first sight they seemed to do. In apprehending these utterances we came to know him as in truth and in deed he really was. Some, at all events, of the greatest sayings ascribed to him were contained in the Synoptic Gospels—the Lord's Prayer, the Sermon on the Mount, and the Parables, notably that of the Prodigal Son—and it was here that we came to know the real Jesus, if anywhere. As to the language in which these sayings were written, that did not affect his argument, which depended on the greatness of the thought, not upon its verbal or linguistic expression. If it should appear that the Fourth Gospel presented a view of Jesus fundamentally different from that of the Lord's Prayer, then that Gospel must be put on one side as being the witness, not of the mind of Jesus, but of the mind of John. It was therefore of extreme importance to examine the testimony of Jesus to himself. He implied always a deep and constant sense of God's nearness. We got back to the real Jesus when we saw in him not merely the man who taught the Lord's Prayer, but who lived it. But the relationship between God and him was always the relation between two, and not the blending of two into one. The witness of Jesus, his authentic utterances, did not indicate that he was in any sense God. Indeed, the view that Jesus was more than man was usually supported by other evidence than that to which the preacher was then alluding. Jesus made himself known by his own witness as a man amongst men—One who was not marked off by any difference in kind from the rest of men, however much he might excel all others in degree. The sermon, which we understand is to be published separately, concluded with an exalted estimate of the character and personality of Jesus, and of his influence in the religious world.

The business meeting was held in the Lord-street Chapel in the afternoon. Mr. JOHN DENDY, the President, was in the chair. There was a large attendance of ministers and representatives of the various congregations. It was resolved that the Bootle congregation and the Chorlton-cum-Hardy congregation be placed on the roll of the Assembly.

PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS.

The PRESIDENT, in his address, said the roll which had been read would have recalled to their minds the losses they had sustained during the past year. If, however, they had experienced losses they had also to rejoice in gains, and in the name of the Assembly he extended a hearty and sincere welcome to all who during the past year had settled in the province. One loss had affected them in common with all their fellow-countrymen. He referred to the death of Queen Victoria. If by law she was the head of the great National Church, outside of which they had to stand, she was also, by virtue of her character, a natural head and leader for all who, whether in any Church or outside of all Churches, were striving after righteousness, peace, and good-will. In so far as those things characterised their civic life, they might claim to have been in the best sense loyal subjects of the great Queen. It behoved them to seek inspiration for their own public and private conduct in the high example she had set. A new era was indeed opening before us with the commencement of the twentieth century—a future over which many clouds were gathering. In literature, in art, in politics, science, and theology, was it not true that we had no longer amongst us men as great as those whom we had known? Even in the business world it seemed as though the constructive and enterprising genius which, adopting the idea of Free Trade, carried the commerce of Britain into all quarters of the globe was being succeeded by a spirit which looked rather to clever financing, combination, and monopoly than to fruitful production and beneficent exchange. Our predecessors had built up a mighty fabric which it was hard for us to sustain. They had opened for us a world vaster, mentally, socially, and politically, than was ever known before. Our task was to live in it worthily, and it was no easy one. We talked about the burden of Empire from a merely political point of view. It was a heavy one indeed. Whether it could be adequately sustained by a people who seemed inclined to substitute for the old teaching "Righteousness exalteth a nation" a new doctrine—namely, that Providence, as a supreme illustration of the survival of the fittest, had destined the English-speaking nations to dominate the world and must therefore take the responsibility for any unpleasantness incidental to the process—was a question which remained to be answered. But there was another empire which the Victorian era had given to us in common with others, in regard to which our difficulties and responsibilities were almost equally great—the empire of human thought to which modern science had introduced us, making us citizens of a universe more wonderful and glorious than was ever conceived of before. We were, moreover, confronted by a number of social and political problems of the gravest kind which called urgently for solution, but with which the nation made little determined effort to deal. It had energy and enthusiasm for war, but not for those things. The struggle for wealth grew more absorbing. We had entered on a period of increasing armaments, increasing debt, increasing taxation. At home we had much discontent; abroad we were hated as few people ever had been. We were engaged in a great war, which all of us lamented, and not a few felt to be a grave stain on the fair fame of our beloved country, a prolonged horror mitigated only in some degree by the courage and fidelity of brave men on both sides, whose lives had been sacrificed by the thousand to the incapacity and ambition of their political leaders. It was natural that they as a church should look forward to-day and ask themselves what part they were to play in the new era. They were at once met by the everlasting alternative, the choice between self and service, which was as truly the problem for churches as it was for individuals. Should they concern themselves chiefly with the multiplication of their numbers and the perpetuation of their names and present forms of belief, or should they, as the first question, ask themselves what service they could render to their fellow men in the difficult time before them, and how they could best discharge it. The first way was the natural outcome of the sectarian spirit; the second was the way of the Master. The great need of the time, the one thing which could make them adequate to the duties of their vast inheritance, was an effective religious belief pervading and dominating their lives. The service of which, above all others, the nation stood in need was a renewal of living belief in God and in goodness in every department of life. He did not wish to suggest any conscious dishonesty in our professions of belief, only that, judged by its fruits in the national life, the religion of our day was somehow lacking in effective vitality. On the other hand, was it not true that a great and honourable honesty kept many outside the churches, their own included, whose language they could not use, and that the loss of the churches thereby was great? Two conditions were essential to an effective religious belief. First, the range of their religious thought must be co-extensive with that of their other thoughts. There must be no regions into which their investigations might lead them where their religious thought could not follow, where they could not find God. Secondly, the field in which they recognised that their religion should be the dominating influence must be not a part only, but the whole of their sphere of action. If those conditions were not fulfilled—and he did not think they were adequately fulfilled to-day—there arose an inconsistency, and with it a certain unreality in their religious belief. We heard less than formerly of the conflict between science and religion, though it did not follow that it was less deadly. What religion had to do was not to win a victory over science, nor to pass by, ignoring its work. It was rather to assimilate, to take up into herself, whatever science might have established, and to find therein fresh sources of strength and fresh matter for interpretation. The law of our life in the new era must be that the life and spirit of Christ must be our high example and guide in public as in private life. A plain answer to the question as to whether that was to be so, or whether we had got beyond it—a clear leading in that matter—was the second great service which the new era demanded of the churches.

Upon the motion of Mr. T. C. ABBOTT, seconded by the Rev. G. A. PAYNE, it was resolved that the next Assembly should be held at Altrincham. An invitation to hold the next meeting at Chowbent was withdrawn.

It was resolved "That ex-treasurers and ex-secretaries of the Assembly be life members thereof."

THE EDUCATION AND TEMPERANCE QUESTIONS.

The Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL moved the adoption of the report of the Committee on Public Questions. Dealing with the Education Bill, the Committee expressed the opinion that in lieu of the policy of the Bill, with its main principle of superseding School Boards, what was required was the placing of the School Boards in supreme authority over both elementary and secondary education in England as in Scotland. The system had worked splendidly in Scotland, and Scotland was far ahead of England in consequence. Universal School Boards, with enlarged areas in the case of all except those in county boroughs, was the education policy to be substituted for that of which the beginnings were seen in the Bill before the House, and of which the issue was manifest in the speech of Sir John Gorst. The voluntary system was doomed; it was suffering under "the intolerable strain" of which its supporters told them; it was inefficient; it aimed at ecclesiastical control rather than education; and it barred the way to the higher education which was vital to the best interests of the people. Upon the question of temperance legislation the report stated that the Government had not been induced by the remarkable support accorded to the proposed reforms urged in the Minority Report to bring in any Bill based upon the recommendation contained in that report, but as yet had contented itself with adopting the Bill introduced by the Bishop of Winchester. The Bill had been so freely amended in Committee that it was almost a new measure, and by some of the changes its scope was materially and prejudicially limited. If it were carried in its present form it could not be regarded as a very great reform, or as likely to arouse any strong feeling of gratitude. It was hoped it might pass through the Commons as it had done through the Lords. With regard to the Sale of Drink to Children Bill the Government had as yet given no sign of complying with the request which its own supporters had made that facilities should be given for its further discussion, but Mr. Balfour had promised to explain the the intentions of the Government.

The Rev. J. C. POLLARD moved the adoption of the report. Discussing the education proposals, he said some of them were of opinion that the Education Bill was the most reactionary and retrograde measure of modern times. The Government showed, in a marked degree, hostility to School Boards throughout the length and breadth of the land. If our education system was to be rescued from its chaotic state there must be one education authority directly controlled by, and responsible to, the people.

Mr. J. HARWOOD seconded the motion. He said it would have been more honest on the part of the Government to have proposed the abolition of School Boards in the first instance. They wanted, however, to bring it about by a sidewind, and to help their friends. The measure must be keenly opposed.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN WAR.

The Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG moved the following:—"That in receiving the report of the Committee on Public Questions this Assembly expresses its regret at the absence of any reference to the moral problems raised by the South African war, and requests the Committee of the Assembly to convene at an early and convenient date a special meeting for the consideration of that problem." He said that though he concurred with the utterance of the report on the various matters it dealt with, he could not concur with its silence on the question of the war. This silence might lead to the supposition outside that, as compared with the questions of temperance and education, this appeared to the Assembly of smaller and less urgent moral and religious importance. Last year the Committee did pronounce an opinion on the war, but many new moral questions in the conduct of the war had come up since then which required to be faced. It was also to be remembered that memories were short. The question was whether the war, which they all deplored and which they must all feel to be sad and terrible, was a moral question of such pressing importance that it should again be brought to the notice of the Assembly. Thousands of lives were being poured out, and the question for consideration was whether those lives were being devoted to the best possible service, both to the country and to humanity, to which they could be dedicated, and whether £2 9s. 3d. spent on the war every second, day and night, was the most remunerative expenditure of the national funds, or whether the money could not be better spent in dealing with such questions as that of the housing of the poor, the settlement of the land question, and in many other ways. The question of the independence of two Republics was one which must have a moral significance, and was a question they should not be afraid to discuss. There was also the terrible, lamentable, and deplorable growth of international hate. In a righteous cause we must face international hate, but when we found international hate rising, and our name a byword amongst our friends on the Continent and all over the civilised world, it was for us to consider whether we were suffering that penalty in some great and righteous cause, or whether our conscience and judgment had been led astray. The moral issues were of such a character that the Assembly could not with any respect to its own traditions ignore them. It was true that other churches had for the most part shirked every public discussion of the matter—(a voice: "Wisely," and other voices, "No," "Some of them have reason," and "Cowardly")—but it was for them to consider whether they had sufficient courage and temper, sufficient mutual forbearance and respect, to come together and consider vast issues of that kind.

The Rev. J. J. WRIGHT seconded the proposal.

The Rev. W. REYNOLDS asked if the mover of the resolution would tolerate any opposition at the meeting proposed.

The CHAIRMAN: The meeting will be conducted as all our meetings are. A hearing will be accorded to both sides.

The Rev. E. W. LUMMIS hoped the discussion of the question would be approached with an open mind and with an absence of partisanship.

The Rev. J. H. WICKSTEED asked that the question of the war in China might be dealt with at the same time.

After some discussion, in which Mr. J. R. BEARD, the Rev. W. REYNOLDS, Mr. T. C. ABBOTT, and others took part, it was resolved that the meeting be called if the Committee should think fit.

The proposal of Mr. Armstrong, with this amendment, was agreed to, and the report adopted.

The Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL explained that a great many subjects had not been reported upon by the Committee. Unfortunately they had not the time to settle the affairs of the world at large, and the Committee took the liberty of selecting one or two subjects on which they could express an opinion within the time at their disposal.

RESOLUTIONS ON EDUCATION AND TEMPERANCE.

The Rev. H. E. DOWSON moved the following resolution:—"That this Assembly is of opinion that the Education Bill now before the House of Commons is inimical to the best interests of education, and should not be passed into law; that the Bill, as the first step towards the suppression of School Boards and their supersession by County Councils acting through committees with co-opted members, tends to destroy the agencies to which has been due most of what is best in the education of the people in public elementary schools conducted on unsectarian lines, and to substitute, through new committees of a less representative character, a system of which the ultimate issue is probably intended to be the general subvention out of the rates not only, as under the Bill, of denominational secondary schools, but also of public elementary schools managed in sectarian interests; that it is inexpedient in the current Session of Parliament to deal fully with the education question, and that the immediate needs of the case would be met by a measure enabling the School Boards, until further legislation is carried, to conduct their higher grade and evening continuation schools on the lines approved by the Board of Education prior to the Cockerton judgment; that the policy of the larger measure, to be introduced at a future date, should be the erection of School Boards made universal (the areas, except in the case of county boroughs, and in these where expedient, being enlarged), into education authorities for elementary, secondary, and technical education, as in Scotland." Mr. Dowson, in a vigorous speech, condemned the provisions of the Bill.

The Rev. R. C. MOORE seconded the motion, which was passed. Copies were directed to be sent to the Marquis of Salisbury, the Duke of Devonshire, Mr. Balfour, Sir John Gorst, Earl Spencer, Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, and Mr. Bryce.

The Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL, on behalf of the Committee, proposed the adoption of a petition to Parliament in support of the Bill for prohibiting the sale of intoxicating drink to children under sixteen years of age. He said there was a danger that the Bill would be whittled down till it was of comparatively small importance.

The Rev. C. J. STREET (Bolton) seconded the resolution, which was passed.

A report on the proceedings of the District Missionary Societies of the Province, and also a report from the Advisory Committee were received. The Rev. C. T. Poynting was elected President for the ensuing year, Mr. John Dendy was re-elected Treasurer, and the Rev. H. E. Dowson Secretary, and the Rev. R. T. Herford was elected co-Secretary. The Rev. T. R. Elliott was elected Supporter for next June.

PUBLIC MEETING.

A public meeting was held in the evening in the Town Hall, and was presided over by Mr. W. H. KENWORTHY. After the singing of a hymn, the CHAIRMAN delivered an interesting and able address by way of opening the proceedings; the usual votes of thanks followed, and a part song by the choir, and then the Chairman called upon the Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG to deliver an address on

"SPIRITUAL RELIGION."

Mr. ARMSTRONG said: By spiritual religion I mean religion which is immediately conscious of, and believes itself to be in contact with, the great all-pervading Spirit to whom we give the awful name of God. There is much in modern science and philosophy which has tended to unsettle the attitude of men's minds towards this infinite Being who lies at the back of all creation, and who permeates the whole natural and spiritual world; and there are those who think that the tendency of increased knowledge has been to accentuate the unknowableness of God, that the sweep of thought has taken Him further from our apprehension, and that it is harder for men to think themselves in actual touch with the Divine. A recent writer says men now know that they cannot know immediately, by the exercise of their faculties, an unconditioned, timeless, omniscient, omnipotent Being. Under such metaphysical definition a humble man finds himself unable to conceive of God. But that does not mean that men do not, therefore, know God; that does not cut away from us the great inheritance which has come down to us through the ages, or dispel the thought of the Psalmist, "Whither shall I go from thy spirit?" or "Whither shall I flee from thy presence?" Surely that sense of awe and joy is not removed from us by the sublimer views of God with which we have entered to-day. We are invited to say that in thinking we could come into contact with God we have made a great mistake, and to confess that we have attempted the impossible; we are to ask men to approach God along some path other than the direct motion of their own souls. To acknowledge that in our high effort and our preaching towards the immediate apprehension of God we have made a great mistake would be to bury in its grave spiritual religion. If we have made a mistake in thinking that the ordinary mortal is capable of conscious touch with the unseen power which permeates the world, spiritual religion is not possible, and in our Theism there is not the breath of life. But is it true? In one way we have a great advantage over our predecessors. Time was when, seeing the volcano burst into flames or the storm tossing the sea, men cried, Behold, the omnipotent arm of the awful God! But they perceived Him not in quieter ways. To-day we have looked on the grasses and the flowers thrilling into blossom under the summer sun, and we say, Behold, the breath and the caress of the never-sleeping God! These things bring Him nearer to us than He was brought to our forefathers. Anyway, surely whether we are of poetic or spiritual temperament or not, we are all conscious in daily life of an unseen power pressing on our lives in ordinary moments and at every moral crisis; surely we are conscious in times of sin of the clash of God against our souls, and in times of obedience and resignation and quiet acceptance of duty of a certain touch and caress of peace; and in religion this is what God means—the awakening of the soul to these unseen experiences. I am told that this is poetic sky-flying; that the average mortal is neither an Isaiah nor a Wordsworth. And that is true. But whence got they the power to touch the human heart? Because they were able to put into words the divine feelings and conceptions which are always moving in the common heart. Otherwise Isaiah might cry ineffectually without an audience; Wordsworth might pipe in vain. But there is a still higher and fuller religious sense which comes to the best of men in every race of mankind. The "beatific vision" is surely possible to the humble labourer as to the greatest ecclesiastic. We are touching the common-sense of humanity when we lay our hands on this sense of immediate contact with the unseen power, the Eternal Spirit, to which we give the name of God.

Are we to put away this ideal, and so come back from our search, and teach men that they cannot find God save in the ecclesiastical way? Or are we, with this ideal in our minds, to call and invite men ever and by every power God has given us, to strive to realise such sense of the touch of God as I have feebly endeavoured to describe?

To my brother ministers and to all workers in religion I would say, "Lift up your voice like a trumpet; lift is up, be not afraid; say unto the cities of Judah (and the cities and villages of Lancashire and Cheshire), Behold your God."

OUR METHODS.

Mr. C. W. JONES, of Liverpool, was the next speaker, the subject of his address being "Is any Change in our Methods required?" This was a trenchant criticism of the Rev. E. W. Lummis's articles on "Choose Life" which appeared some months ago in THE INQUIRER. He thought the author ought to have been in our body sixteen years rather than six before assuming such vast knowledge of the life of our churches. He himself had been a Unitarian nearly sixty years, and for forty years had been, as it were, in the inner circles of Unitarianism and could therefore speak with some authority. Work which the author assumed to be a rarity amongst us had been largely and successfully carried on for over sixty years. He repudiated the statement that the rich reluctantly gave of their wealth, and pointed to the Augmentation and Sustentation Funds and Manchester College, Oxford, as examples of the way in which well-to-do Unitarians generously subscribed when they were convinced that the cause was a good one.

To say that Unitarians were the least brotherly of Christians was a libel upon their true character. When he sat on the platform at the recent meetings in London, surrounded by representatives of fifteen nationalities, he felt as if he had been with them all his life, and the same fraternal feeling, he was sure, animated the rest of those present. As to the need of a more vigorous polemic, he knew that the Unitarian churches in Liverpool kept the people enlightened as to the march of thought in theology, and he had no reason to doubt that other Churches were working on similar lines.

As to the remedies suggested, a "Review" had been tried and proved a failure. He did not think a "Name" would secure the result the writer desired; and to organise our scattered, independent causes into a Church, with a central executive to have control over them would be fatal to their principle and life. "It ought to be a Church to assail all evil." Surely this is being nobly done. He knew it was in Liverpool. The one statement in the Articles with which he did wholly agree was that the defect of our Church life "is not to be remedied by whining, but by work." He hoped that, as Mr. Lummis was now settled at Warrington, he would go to Liverpool and see what was being done there at the Domestic Missions and in other directions. It was not that we wanted to change our methods; but, working on the same lines as our forefathers, we only needed to put more spirit and energy into our undertakings.

"SUNDAYS."

An address on "Sundays" was delivered by the Rev. DENDY AGATE, B.A., in the course of which he said that he went back in thought to the Sundays of his youth, and was grateful for the religious influences that moulded his character. He could not help at times asking himself and his friends, "Do we really make from beginning to end the very best use of our Sundays." He believed very much in the quiet religious atmosphere of the home, and in the beauty and helpfulness of united worship, and was so uplifted at times that he wished to say, on behalf of himself and his brother ministers, that he did not think the laity, as a whole, understood what it was to the ministers Sunday after Sunday to speak to them the words given to them to speak. If they could depend upon well-filled pews, it would lift them up into the mount of prophecy. He had heard it sometimes savagely said that Unitarians were people who went to church when they did not want to go anywhere else. If they could all enter more earnestly into the worshipping assembly desiring to have both the individual life and the corporate life stimulated in thought and work, they would go out into the world with hearts more thoroughly lifted up than they at present are. Many members of our congregations do not realise what their connection means in steady fellowship and work, or they would put a little more spirit into what they did. He prayed that the worshipping spirit that dwell in their fathers and made them honoured, might more and more dwell in them; and that they might see to it that the true spirit of work and worship should more and more grow in our schools and churches; to realise that they had a great task given them by God, and that they ought to fulfil it to the best of their ability.

The proceedings then ended.

Our correspondent adds this note:—"It was a grand meeting. Indeed, the whole of the day's proceedings were highly inspiring, and all the arrangements were carried out excellently. Nothing could have been better than the catering which was capably undertaken by the ladies of the church; while the choir provided good music at both the morning service and evening meeting."

YORKSHIRE UNITARIAN UNION.

THE annual meeting of this Union was held on Wednesday, June 12, at Scarborough. In the morning a religious service was conducted by the Rev. O. BINNS, of Scarborough, and a sermon was preached by the Rev. J. E. MANNING, of Sheffield.

In the afternoon Mr. GROSVENOR TALBOT, of Leeds, President of the Union, took the chair at the annual business meeting.

The Committee's report, which was presented, showed that an endeavour to revive interest in the religious welfare of the community had been made in the month of March—special services, lectures, and social meetings having taken place at various chapels throughout the county. This movement had been preceded by a New Year's Day service and conference at Leeds, where a very large number of friends had assembled. At this meeting it was desired that a minister-at-large should be appointed as soon as possible; but the finances of the Union do not at present admit of this step being taken. The income included £112 in subscriptions; £64, collections; and, with special donations, grants, and dividends added, reached about £336. There is a balance due of £67.

The Report of the Yorkshire Unitarian Postal Mission showed that nearly two hundred applications had been received from correspondents in answer to advertisements. The correspondence showed a warm appreciation of Unitarian literature and a wide-spread, though often hidden, sympathy with Unitarian views.

These Reports were received and adopted, on the motion of the CHAIRMAN, seconded by the Rev. A. CHALMERS; and the following officers were appointed:—

President, Mr. Grosvenor Talbot, J.P.; Vice-President, Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, M.A. and Rev. A. Chalmers; Treasurer, Mr. George Webster, J.P., General Secretary, Mr. E. Basil Lupton, LL.M.; Supply Secretary, Rev. John Ellis; Auditor, Mr. F. R. Pesel, J.P.; Postal Mission Secretaries, Misses Lucas.

A welcome was accorded to the Revs. C. Harvey Cook, J. Dale, W. Harold Davies, J. M. Whiteman, and W. Rodger Smyth, on the motion of the Rev. C. HARGROVE, seconded by the Rev. F. HAYDN WILLIAMS.

The Revs. C. HARGROVE and C. HARVEY COOK reported on the resolutions adopted at the New Year's Conference; they recommended that a report of the Union's work should be issued quarterly.

Thanks were given to the preacher of the day, to the workers in the March Missions, to the Lay preachers, and to the Scarborough congregation for their hospitality.

EVENING MEETING.

In the evening the President again occupied the chair at a public meeting which was fairly attended.

The Rev. C. HARGROVE gave a very earnest address, in the course of which he remarked that there were millions of people in the land who said they did not believe this and that thing, just what the Unitarians did not believe; but when asked, however, to declare their views, the millions came to hundreds of thousands, and of these many went to the Established Church for the sake, perhaps of social position and other matters which they supposed to be obtained. It was only the tens of thousands who had the courage openly to declare their convictions. What did Unitarians believe? They believed in God, they believed in helping their fellow-men and bringing them to God, who was Love. They did not believe that if they rejected certain dogmas laid down by men they would be eternally damned.

The Rev. J. E. MANNING next spoke, and he criticised at some length the opinions of the Vicar of All Saints'. The latter had said "Unitarians brought clever intellectual arguments, they brought only the intellect to bear on religious matters." That, as Dr. Eyre said of the objections to the Athanasian Creed, was mere clap-trap. Unitarians brought every faculty which God had given them for the understanding of religion and of His presence in the world as orthodox people claimed to do, and then they applied to the questions pure common-sense, and nothing else. Then Dr. Eyre had said there were many mysteries they could not understand in this world. True, but there was a vast difference between the mysteries of God and a theologian's mysteries. Dr. Eyre did not seem to understand one thing, and that was that there were two types of men in this world—one who always went in for authorities, and the other who fell back upon common-sense. The latter somewhat resembled the early Greeks, who thought much, and were optimistic; the former, the Roman type, who were very obedient to authority and pessimistic. The Unitarians resembled the Greek, the Trinitarians the Roman. The Unitarians sought to investigate and worship God simply and according to their understandings.

The Rev. C. HARVEY COOK then gave an inspiring address, urging the Unitarians to work, to train up the children, and to get into the Church as many of those men—working-men and others—who never went into a place of worship.

Mr. GILCHRIST (Scarborough) also spoke, and the usual vote of thanks to the Chairman brought the proceedings to a close.

WE desire again to remind our readers that on Monday next a meeting will be held at Queen's Hall, Langham-place, in aid of the South African Women and Children's Distress Fund. Miss Emily Hobhouse, whose account of the camps in which these sufferers are confined has received such pained attention in and out of Parliament, will speak on the subject. Admission is free, but reserved tickets, price one shilling, may be obtained from Mr. F. W. Lawrence, Mansfield House, Canning Town.

BLACKFRIARS MISSION AND STAMFORD-STREET CHAPEL, S.E.

SUMMER COTTAGE FOR 1901.

SIR,—Kindly spare me space to say to your readers, many of whom are interested in our work at Stamford-street, that we have commenced the sending of families to the house taken by us for the summer months near to Mitcham, Surrey.

To carry on effectually this part of our operation, by which much pleasure and happiness as well as health are given to many persons both old and young, living in the thickly peopled neighbourhood of the chapel, we appeal to the generous feelings of those friends who, having the means, will, we are certain, be only too pleased to assist in helping us to give change of air and scene to those whose opportunities of getting the same are necessarily very limited.

Subscriptions or donations will be very gladly received by the Hon. Treasurer, Mrs. David Martineau, 4, South-road, Clapham-park, S.W., or myself at 5, Holland-grove, S.W.

"IMMORALITY AND INFIDELITY."

SIR,—The "grave charge" of immorality and infidelity is made in Mr. Armstrong's paper on the Incarnation—explicitly against certain persons supposed to shape doctrine for ethical purposes, with the implication that that practice is resorted to by those theologians who hold the doctrine or doctrines which he is subjecting to adverse criticism. Occurring in such a paper, such seemed the natural interpretation of the words.

In the earlier part of his remarks Mr. Armstrong speaks of the teaching of the Incarnation as mostly resting on a profound agnosticism; he then implies, or appears to imply, that this and similar doctrines are put forward on the ground of their supposed ethical usefulness, irrespective of their truth (compare, for a similar imputation, Mr. Armstrong's letter in your issue of April 13); and he concludes that those who do this are guilty of a profound immorality and a profound infidelity. J. WARSCHAUER.

[In the Christian World this week a paragraph appears in connection with the article by a "Unitarian Correspondent," which appeared in its columns last week, and to which reference was made in our "Notes of the Week." Our contemporary says that "as no verbatim report has yet appeared, our correspondent wrote direct to Rev. R. A. Armstrong, the speaker referred to, who sends us the following explanation:—'In the paper referred to by your correspondent I spoke of the advocacy of a doctrine on the ground that it is calculated to edify, apart from the consideration of its truth, as "a profound immorality and a profound infidelity."' The words we have put in italics, says the Christian World, give, of course, an entirely new and more worthy complexion to the utterance. The paper is, we understand, to appear in THE INQUIRER, but our correspondent at once accepts Mr. Armstrong's correction while asking us to state that he gave a bonâ fide report of his impression of what was said." Mr. Armstrong's paper appears in full in our issue this week.—ED. INQ.]

THE SELECTION OF HYMNS.

SIR,—At the recent annual service of the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire the congregation was invited to sing, as a hymn, a very beautiful little poem about Jesus. It is full of the spirit of faith and love; but contains a direct statement of the orthodox dogma of the two natures of Jesus Christ, and closes with a prayer to the second person in the Trinity.

The gentleman who selected it may have been misled by the name of its author—for it was written by an Anglican clergyman who has since seceded, and now adds lustre to our own body—or perhaps he is able, and believes that we are all able, to use such hymns by means of a liberal interpretation, which neglects the intellectual form and seizes only on the spiritual context. To all who possess this power may I appeal on behalf of the weaker brethren? Those who have been in prison are startled by the mere clank of a chain. It was, indeed, our lack of this very faculty—to ignore the intellectual meaning of devotional utterances—that drove some of us into self-banishment from a creed-reciting church. Out of the abundance of choice it will not be hard for our stronger brethren, in kindly tolerance of our weakness, to select hymns which we can all sing together without reserve or constraint.

E. W. LUMMIS.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

"Be merciful, even as your Father in heaven is merciful." Have you ever thought what those words really mean, and what a beautiful thing it is to know and feel that God is merciful to us, His children?

And we have to try to be merciful too. Sometimes it is very difficult to feel kindly towards anyone who has been unkind to us or done us any wrong; but then we have to remember that God is always very merciful to us, and we have to try to be like Him. Do you think that God wishes us ill, or ceases to love any of His children, when they do wrong? No, indeed! His love is always the same, and His one thought is to help us into the better way.

We must learn to be merciful, not only to those who have wronged us, but to everyone we meet with in our daily life; for sometimes we dislike people, and are inclined to think and say unkind things about them, when they have never done us any wrong.

There was once a little girl who had heard a great deal about going to heaven; and one day she asked the minister in the place where she lived, what she must do to be able to go to heaven. He told her she must try and love everybody. "What," she exclaimed, "must I love old Jim?" And the minister said, "Yes, my child, you must even learn to love old Jim."

Now Jim was a rag man, and besides being old and cross and ugly, he was also wicked, and when the children were naughty the nurses used to frighten them by saying that they would give them to old Jim.

The little girl thought about it, and then said to herself, "Well, if I want to go to heaven, I must love old Jim." So she made up her mind to go and see him, and to try and make friends.

The first time she went she was rather afraid, and the old man was very much surprised, for he was not used to people being kind and seeming to care for him. But she was so bright and so evidently wanted to be friendly that he could not help being glad to see her, and she very soon got over her fear. She went again and again, and sometimes would take flowers to the old man, and he began to look forward to her coming, and for her sake to be ashamed of his evil ways; so they two became fast friends, and she had not only learnt to love the old man, but had done far more good than she knew in helping him to live a better life.

What we have to do is to look always for the good in people rather than the evil. Some people whenever they hear anyone spoken well of, think they must say something against them, and often in that way do a great deal of harm and show a very unlovely temper. We should not like to think that our friends were always thinking about our faults and talking about them to others. It is far better to look for the good in everyone; and if we do, we shall always find it, even in the most unlikely people. And remember that God loves us all, even with our many faults, so we must learn to be merciful, as He is merciful.

A long time ago there lived in France an old miser, who used to go about the streets in a very old coat and hat; people used to sneer at him, the boys pelted him with stones, and no one had a kind word to say for him. At last he died, and then it was found that he had left all his money to be used to bring pure water into the town. He had noticed how, for many years, the poor people had suffered for want of it, and that was the reason why he had hoarded his money and lived like a miserable old miser, so that he might have the more to leave to do the people that great good.

How much better it would have been if, instead of sneering at the old man and throwing stones at him, his neighbours had tried to find some good in him, and had asked why it was he saved all his money!

We have not only to think well of others, but to do things to help them as well; and every one of you can do that. There was a man once who tried every day to do at least one thing to help some one; and he liked to think that when he did that, it meant helping 365 people every year. Suppose you try to do as he did, even if it is only some very little thing you do each day. When you try, it is wonderful how much you find you can do; and in that way you will learn more and more to see the good there is in other people, for doing good helps you to see good. In that way also you learn to love more, and so you will come to understand better and better what it is to be merciful, as your Father in heaven is merciful.

DOES IT MATTER?

THERE are undoubtedly, as Mr. HARGROVE indicated in his address at Scarborough last week, many people who are in general sympathy with Unitarian views, but who hold aloof from Unitarians in worship and missionary work. Does it matter? The answer depends partly on one's estimate of the forces wielded by men in carrying out divine purposes, and partly on one's judgment as to the necessity of being frank and sincere in matters pertaining to religion. A man may say to himself that "the drift of things" is with liberal religious thought. He may compare the ardent propagandist to a man who with a tiny jet of warm water should try to melt an iceberg. Let but the current below and the atmosphere above do their slow but irresistible work, and the iceberg will dissolve not here and there alone, but altogether. It is certain that the currents of modern life will by and by bring all the ancient ecclesiastical and doctrinal systems to a stage where they must either undergo vast transformations or be relegated to the museum of curious but obsolete things. It is certain that the breath of the Spirit of Truth is blowing upon the quaint old traditions and the grim old fears, and that what was held credible by the fathers can be believed by their intelligent sons no more. Science, criticism, and affection freed from dogma, are making the old creeds impossible for multitudes, especially of the young, every year.

"Well then," a man may say, "why should I trouble myself? How can it make any difference one way or the other, whether I—one solitary person—say this or that? The world will go on, and if its 'going on' is really progress, I may thankfully sit still and watch the great development." Yes; a man may say that—many do say it—in connection with religious progress; and some say it in connection with political progress. But if it comes to practical matters, the fallacy is too glaring to deceive. The summer sunshine and fruitful rains make for harvest, indispensably. But inevitably? Rather not, if the farmers and their labourers fold their arms and wait on Providence!

Of course the man who reads these lines is but one, and may be a very obscure one; but the nation is made of ones, mostly obscure. The harvest of orderly, beautiful, fruitful human life—and it is this alone that accredits any form of religious culture—is attainable only by the influence of ones on ones. There is simply no such thing as "religious progress" in the abstract. The real thing is the religious progress of this man and that throughout the community. A little quiet reflection will relieve any man of the power of the subtle spell that makes for idleness in isolation. If the world's work is to be done, if the truth is to be spoken, if the tyranny of false ideals and foolish fears is to be shattered and men are to be set free to live manly lives, it must be by the action of individuals.

He who is convinced of this needs not to be warned against the dangers of insincerity in matters pertaining to religion. It must be because men think they are too insignificant to count, that they go on saying one thing with the lip and believing another in the heart. Or, apparently, they consider a little equivocation does not matter to their own souls—if, indeed, they dare cease a moment from what they call "practical Christianity" to consider what they do really think. Does it matter whether the rector really does believe or not that the baby is a child of wrath till it is sprinkled, and afterwards a child of grace? He is a good man, kindly, intelligent, busied in a hundred useful ways for the parish. Ought he to tell the fathers and mothers that he has not the slightest trust in the story of ADAM and EVE, and that the reference to NOAH'S Ark in the Baptismal Service is to him only a little bit of quaint mythology? May he go on talking as if he believed the devil to be a personality, and bodily resurrection a certainty—and be held blameless while the sharp lads and girls grow up to be shocked from trust in all religious teaching when they find out how little validity his exoteric doctrines really possess—still more when they learn that he is one of scores or hundreds who hold an esoteric view of things which is quite different?

Does it matter when people, who are assured in their mind that the priestly claim to authority in the church is all moonshine, go to church and behave as if they accepted it all, and make bigger the crowd that thinks it must be right if it is only big enough? Does it matter when people, who have inwardly revolted against the appalling notion of an everlasting hell-fire, keep silence while others, who would fain revolt but dare not, are being crushed for want of a word of liberating encouragement? It ought to matter; and it does, both to the world and to the individual.

And it matters when men who see the evil of narrow views and unintelligent teaching in religion, and who know that the number of those who dare to stand out against conventionalism and fashion is small, nevertheless do little or nothing to substitute a better way for the old unsatisfactory ways that provoke their regrets, and sometimes their contempt. The thing at issue is, not the fate of churches and sects, but truth, and the life that dwindles and perishes if it is fed upon a lie. In this matter the stronger and more enlightened is as much "his brother's keeper" as in any other; if he is faithless to his trust in this respect he cannot escape the condemnation of an outraged conscience.

TESTIMONIAL TO MR. DAVID MARTINEAU.—It will be remembered by members and friends of the London District Unitarian Society that at the Society's annual meeting last month it was resolved that Mr. David Martineau should be presented with his portrait in oils, as a mark of esteem and regard, on his having retired from the office of treasurer after thirty years' service. Arrangements have now been completed for the portrait to be painted by Mr. Arthur Hacker, A.R.A., whose work is well represented this year in the exhibition of the Royal Academy, and in the New Gallery. Mr. Hacker has a good reputation as a portrait-painter, and among examples of his successful treatment attention may be drawn to "Alderman and Sheriff Vaughan, Treasurer, Christ's Hospital," to "J. F. L. Brunner, Esq.," and to "Thomas C. Dewey, Esq.," which pictures are all now on view in the Royal Academy. We understand that the hon. treasurer of the portrait fund (Mr. H. Epps, 95, Upper Tulse Hill, S.W.), has not yet closed his list of contributors, and would be glad to receive additions to it.

THE Rev. R. A. Armstrong, writing from 5, Marmion-road, Liverpool, S., says:—Allow me to say that I can receive donations for "Our Youngest Brother," the little congregation at Copenhagen, up to the first postal delivery on Tuesday morning next. I have privately acknowledged all hitherto received except that of "W. W.," Clifton, who gives no further address. The contributions, though hardly so numerous as I anticipated, have all been accompanied with very cordial expressions of interest and goodwill.

COUNTRY HOLIDAY MOVEMENT.—Miss A. Lawrence, 23, Campden House-chambers, Campden-hill, London, W., begs to acknowledge, with many thanks, receipt for this fund of the following sums:—Miss Howse, £1; A. K., £1 10s.; Miss G. Taylor, £1; Mr. Oswald Nettlefold, £1 1s.; Mrs. Frank Jolly, 10s.; also a parcel of clothing from Miss Trower.

RELIGIOUS THOUGHT IN ENGLAND AT THE CLOSE OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

BY THE REV. R. A. ARMSTRONG, B.A.*

OBVIOUSLY in the time allotted I can deal with but a few selected aspects of Religious Thought in England at the close of the Nineteenth Century, and with those in but the broadest way. Serious thinking on religion in this country, among those who still believe in a theology, seems more and more to concentrate itself about the doctrine of the Incarnation. It is mainly on recently current thinking on this theme that I shall speak to-day.

The first thing that strikes me, however, in English Religious Thinking as the century drew to its close is the breadth of its scepticism, the profundity of its agnosticism. To this I shall have to return more than once. But I ask you now to realise that much that passes for most orthodox is in reality saturated with agnosticism. Martineau showed long ago how one in so good savour of orthodoxy as Bishop Butler in reality walked on the edge of the precipice of an absolute scepticism. In the time of our own fathers Dean Mansel played the like game. But the closing decade of the century saw a similar position more unblushingly assumed in the famous treatise of Mr. Balfour, whose final argument for the acceptance of current creeds is at bottom a confession that neither the men of religion nor the men of science really know anything about anything at all.

But no recent writer has set the essentially negative position of cultivated modern orthodoxy in a clearer light than Dr. Percy Gardner in his "Exploratio Evangelica." "A great part," says he, "of the historical substratum which is supposed to support many of the doctrines and beliefs of Christianity is in a ruinous condition." And he sets to work "to seek elsewhere" "a sufficient foundation for Christian faith." The doctrine accepted at any period, according to him, is simply the reflection of life as it then is. Thus as life, conduct, and sentiment shift, doctrine necessarily shifts no less. The ideas and principles which form life at any time the men of that time strive to justify to the intellect. And as the original feeling which gave life to those principles cools, "doctrine is deposited like crystals." Thus the historical method is brought to bear on doctrine as well as on all else; and the most sacred creeds concerning God, Man, and Eternal Life, like everything else in the universe, fall into the melting-pot of evolution. The men of yesterday, of to-day, of to-morrow can think and believe no other than that which corresponds to the stage of their culture attained yesterday, to-day, or to-morrow. They may flatter themselves that they are constructing their doctrinal system by process of abstract reason dealing with eternal fact. But they are for ever deceived. What seems the most rigid demonstration is in fact but the proceed of a particular level of life and feeling.

Now in all this there is doubtless a considerable modicum of truth. It is at any rate the direct inference from Dr. Gardner's initial position, though not presented by him in so naked a form. But the true religious thinker cannot rest in such a position unqualified. To believe that all you believe to-day will be necessarily disbelieved by the best men to-morrow, is not to believe at all, but to reduce all doctrine to the rank of a mere momentary working hypothesis. It is blank scepticism, sheer agnosticism. In all genuine theological thinking, the thinker, though he recognise his subjectivity to evolution, must think the doctrine in which he finds intellectual satisfaction true, not a mere temporary formula. He may recognise that it is partial truth only, relative truth only, but as far as it goes he must believe it true. I cannot, for instance, at the same time believe in a Personal God and believe that in the course of evolution the attribute personality will be seen to be inapplicable to God. I cannot to-day believe that God was incarnate in Jesus Christ, yet hold that to-morrow such a belief is likely to be dissolved in a higher truth. We must either be frankly sceptical, or else believe that in a certain sense we can attain finality.

And so we are compelled, in spite of the claims of the historic method and the recognition of evolution, the great achievements of the nineteenth century, to discuss such doctrines as the Incarnation or the Trinity on their merits, or what we suppose to be their merits, no less peremptorily now in 1901 than did our grandfathers in 1801. We adduce probably very different arguments for or against, but if we claim a legitimate place for theology in human thinking at all, we have to discuss these doctrines pro or contra with straight arguments directed rigidly upon them. Our question will not be, "Does this doctrine make for clearer faith or for purer conduct?" Our question will be, "Is this doctrine true?" And wherever there is fundamental faith in the harmony of the spiritual universe, we shall be supported by the underlying conviction, that in the end what is most true will most make for religion and for righteousness. He who shapes doctrine for ethical purposes is guilty of a profound immorality and a profound infidelity.

It is a curious and interesting phenomenon that while the champions of Trinitarian doctrine at the beginning of the nineteenth century championed it as a demand on faith made by authority, a thing difficult to believe, seemingly contrary to reason, but revealed from on high, the champions of Trinitarian doctrine at the close of the nineteenth century championed it as the only doctrine yielding philosophical satisfaction, and as required to remove the intellectual difficulties inherent in Unitarian heresy. The popular writers of the day make it a commonplace that to teach the unqualified unity of God is to be guilty of the grossest lack of philosophy. Such is the tone of such eminent preachers as Dr. Watson, of Liverpool, and Mr. Campbell, of Brighton; and they have, of course, the support of names of much higher renown. The evangelical church-goer of a century since was taught that the Unitarian was a very bad man, however tempting his doctrine to mere carnal reason. The evangelical church-goer of to-day is often taught that the Unitarian is a remarkably good man, but that his doctrine is wholly unreasonable. We are reproached to-day by the characteristic thinkers, not for infidelity, but for sore lack of philosophy. It is probably just about a hundred years since William Cobbett in one of his genial moods as quoted in "The Etchingham Letters," wrote: "The Unitarians will not believe in the Trinity because they cannot account for it. . . . I do most heartily despise this priggish set for their conceit and impudence."

The main philosophical difficulties which the orthodox apologist of to-day sees in the Unitarian doctrine are two: first, that it ascribes an unrelieved loneliness to God; secondly, that it fails to explain communion between God and man.

Let us glance at these two difficulties as articulated in England at the close of the nineteenth century. It is said that, if the nature of God be Love, there must have existed eternally an object on which that love could be expended. But if man and kindred children of God be creatures of time, if the universe itself be a birth of time, prior to the appearance of the universe God must have been without such object for his love unless he could find it within his own being. But he could not so find it unless his own being comprised a personal plurality. And the Trinity provides such a plurality. God, says Mr. Campbell, "goes forth from Himself in the Eternal Son, to return to Himself in the Eternal Spirit." The Father, the Son, and the Spirit "are a society in unity." "God, who objectifies Himself in the Eternal Son, returns to Himself in the Eternal Spirit." The Spirit "completes the cycle of the Divine society." Christian theology has maintained the like theses before; but it would be hard to find a Father or a Schoolman who has put it more baldly than it is put in these phrases of Mr. Campbell; and this is the characteristic and popular English preaching with which the century closed.

When such a preacher becomes conscious that he runs the danger of inculcating tritheism, he at once empties the term persona or person of all that makes it adequate to sustain the part here ascribed to it. Persona, it is explained, is, after all, merely a self-manifestation, a function, an aspect; and we are presented with the idea of one self-manifestation loving another, the second function of the one personality supplying an object of love to the first function.

Professor Knight, in the interesting correspondence with Dr. Martineau which he has just given to the world, had recourse to the same expedient to provide an eternal sphere for the divine love. He says that he does not see "how the Divine love could have been an everlasting reality, outflowing from a Divine centre, except on the theory of an eternal Duality within the Divine Nature itself." Professor Knight, while formally admitting the Trinitarian doctrine, does not cumber himself with any contention beyond the duality of God. He is content with the society of two, and so escapes the straits so many theologians are put to to discover some distinct and adequate function for the third member of the divine company. Dr. Martineau, however, is no more prepared to admit the duality than the trinity of the Godhead. "An object loved," says he, "cannot be within the loving nature, without reducing the love to a form of self-love." His correspondent speaks of a "duality within the divine Personality." But such a conception does not relieve God of the "solitude" and "selfishness" which it is sought to escape. It will not do, thinks Martineau, for his friend to rest his case on "two somewhats in one Person; it requires two Persons in one God," and "the conditions of Ditheism are surely complete." The demands of God's eternal love are met by Dr. Martineau with "a perpetual Cosmos."

But the modern theologian further charges it against Unitarianism that it fails to explain the communion between God and Man.

It is impossible, it is said, to conceive of such communion apart from the orthodox doctrine. The finite, Man, cannot apprehend the infinite, God. Accordingly a God-Man is conceived in whom the finite and the infinite commingle, and the gulf is thus represented to be bridged. It is characteristic of the English religious thinking at the close of the nineteenth century that this incarnation of God in Man is extended from the typical instance of Jesus Christ to mankind at large. The doctrine of the Incarnation is made to include the Incarnation of God in ordinary men. And here the left wing of the evangelical trinitarians—men like Dr. Clifford—appear to meet the right wing of those who still, I believe, consider themselves as Unitarians, and whom we are all glad to consider so.

One has to remark on this phase of religious thinking that it is difficult to understand exactly what is meant by "incarnation" on the lips of those who enunciate it. "Enfleshing" is not a spiritual idea; and though the theologians use the language of the flesh, they undoubtedly wish to describe a phenomenon of the spirit. In the incarnation, then, whether in Jesus Christ or in all Christian men, we must ask them explicitly to inform us whether they imply a fusion of the persons of God and man into one person, or merely so close a coalescence between God and man as to render the passage of communion from one to the other easy. If they mean an actual unification of person—that God is Christ and Christ is God, that God is the good man and that the good man is God—then they land us either in pantheism or in inextricable confusions of thought. If on the other hand they mean only a very close approximation of the divine and the human persons, without interfusion, they in no way relieve the original difficulty.

Whatever philosophical difficulty there may be in conceiving of communion between God in his heaven and man in his closet, there is exactly the same difficulty in conceiving of communion between God and man though enshrined in one temple of flesh.

There is, however, another looseness of terminology against which all must be warned who desire to estimate theological thought in England at the turn of the century. The name Christ is used for at least three several concepts. It is used as a name or title denoting the historical personage Jesus of Nazareth as known to us through the gospel records. It is used for the Christ now conceived to be exercising a certain spiritual dominion independently of his recorded deeds or words. It is used of an ideal humanity unconfined to any one individual soul. Theologians shift from one to the other without warning and apparently without conscious deviation. But such loose handling of terms is fatal to all true and worthy thinking.

Fix the term Christ to any one of these three concepts rigidly, and two-thirds of the current orthodox apologetics fall away.

Now the Unitarian form of thought, or what may described as Christian Theism, does not profess to explain the communion of God and man or to tell us by what means God impresses his presence on the human consciousness. It knows that it can explain neither the divine action nor the human apprehension, any more than we can explain the action of brain on thought or of will on muscle. It recognises in either case that there is a chasm to be passed, and it can fling no logical bridge across that chasm. But it accepts the fact of experience, an experience attested with overwhelming fulness, as it accepts those other experiences, the fact of a bridge between brain and thought, between will and muscle, between force and matter. It not only accepts the fact of experience, but it accepts it as primary, as fundamental, as the necessary datum of all spiritual religion.

We have got to-day to the bottom conflict. Can man become directly conscious of God? Can God impress himself on the consciousness of man? If the answer be "Yes," then religion is wrought into the structure of the spiritual universe. It may be eclipsed, overshadowed, submerged. But it exists for ever. It is indestructible; it is secure. If the answer be "No," then theology after theology may be put forward to save religion, but religion is doomed. It is a vast delusion. It cannot be rescued. You may call in Church or Bible as authority. You may call in Christ as Mediator or Revealer. But these are all vain expedients. The facts of human nature do not support you. If there be no religion at first hand for us, religion at second hand is all in the air; it is a makeshift and a delusion.

That is what I mean by saying that the current orthodoxies all rest in a quagmire of scepticism, have their roots in the dry sands of agnosticism. They are all contrivances for bolstering up religious belief in minds which reject the essential and bottom fact of religion. Men do not believe that the child of God can directly know his Father; they do not believe that the soul can be filled with the consciousness of God besetting. The evangelical accordingly presents us with a Christ assumed to possess a spiritual faculty denied to us, and bids us accept from him that which we cannot without him experience ourselves. And we may note in passing that the sacramentalist—no less agnostic—disbelieves in the direct touch of spirit with spirit, and so entrusts the spiritual life to material vessels, in which he does believe; the sacramentalist of to-day, in his scepticism, exactly reversing the nobler sacramentalism of Newman, who did believe in the life of the spirit, but was very doubtful of the reality of matter, and so saw even in material sacraments only the shadowy and unsubstantial symbols of spiritual action.

Finally, if we are to preserve a theology—a philosophy of God and religion—at all, we must take to heart the grave warning Dr. Gardner gives us. He shows how Jewish Christianity meeting the broad and mighty stream of Hellenic thought was forced, if it was to live, to adjust itself to that new and vast environment, and so had to modify every fibre of its intellectual structure; and he points out that Christianity to-day is called to an encounter still more tremendous, and therefore to an adjustment still more penetrating and searching. "The same kind of change must come over" modern Christianity, he says, "which came over the religion of the first Christian thinkers, when they came forth into the intellectual world of the time, and had to make terms with Greek culture." At this dawn of the twentieth century, patching and peddling will be of no avail. It is not a matter of repairing a column here and opening a doorway there in the temple of theologic thought. The common apologetics are vain as fitting a steam-engine with wings. Christian thought encounters the vast and majestic idea, the mighty, solvent organon named "Evolution." It must take up into itself that supreme idea, it must fashion itself by that potent instrument; or it must be shattered to a thousand fragments, destroyed from off the face of the earth.

A theology which can pass that test will feed a broad and generous ethics. Religion will once more be the recognised ally of all that is noblest in human struggle and aspiration. It will put away from it for ever ecclesiastical alliances which enchain the intellect, ultimately degrade the character and give the rule over immortal souls to the secular tyrant and the priest. It will stand for the freedom of nations, for the peace of the world, for the enduring brotherhood of man.

CENTRAL POSTAL MISSION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE annual meeting of the Central Postal Mission and Unitarian Workers' Union was held at Essex Hall, on Tuesday afternoon in Whit-week, and there was a very large attendance of members and friends.

The chair was taken by Miss TAGART, the President, and the following representatives and delegates were present:—Miss Dowsing, Birmingham; Miss Dowson, Eastern Union; Miss E. Cooke and Miss Maughan, Liverpool; Miss Evans and Mrs. Noel Johnson, Manchester; Mrs. Crompton, N. and E. Lancashire; Miss Else, N. Midland; Mrs. Lewis, S. Wales; Mrs. Rogers, Miss Mathews, and Miss Dressler, Portsmouth; Miss Spencer, Southern Association; Rev. and Mrs. Tudor Jones, Swansea; Mr. Cock, Three Towns; Miss Barmby, Western Union; Miss Lucas, Yorkshire Union; also the following vice-presidents and members of the Central Committee:—Miss Clephan, Miss F. Cooke, Miss Gittins, Miss Burkitt, Miss Lister, Mrs. Herbert Smith, Mrs. E. H. Morton, Mrs. Stronge, Mrs. Summers, Miss Teschemacher, Miss Preston, Miss Herford, Miss Hind, Mrs. Pearsall, Mrs. Winser, and Lady Wilson. Miss Van Eck represented the Dutch Postal Mission.

On the motion of the PRESIDENT, seconded by Lady WILSON, the following resolution was passed in reverent silence:—

We desire to express our deep sorrow at the death of two friends and vice-presidents of this Society—Mrs. Brooke Herford and Miss Durning Smith. In Mrs. Brooke Herford we have lost, not only an enthusiastic supporter of the Postal Mission, but of every cause which aims at the uplifting of women. Miss Durning Smith's staunch adherence to the Unitarian faith and munificent support will make her missed throughout the whole denomination.

May our sorrow be tempered by the thought that these two venerated leaders have entered into their blessed rest, and that their works of love and piety may help their successors to bring forth like rich fruits of religion and righteousness.

The PRESIDENT, in her opening address, dwelt on the value of women's work in connection with our churches, and instanced the result of last year's London Bazaar, in the establishment of a Permanent Building Fund. In many congregations throughout the country little circles of workers had been able to render invaluable services. The Women's Congregational Union, in connection with Hope-street Church, Liverpool, had shown what could be done by a strong committee of women, who kept in touch with the philanthropic work of the city.

Miss FLORENCE HILL presented the report of the Committee, and Miss LAWRENCE the Treasurer's accounts.

The Report opened with a reference to the growth of the work, which showed that of the four ladies who started the first Postal Mission in England three were still actively engaged in the work, while missions were springing up in all directions, and there were now nineteen secretaries with groups of workers round them, and since the beginning of the movement in 1886 no less than 21,242 people had applied for literature. A summary of the collective work of the Missions in 1900 showed that there had been 1,967 new applicants for literature and 1,302 old correspondents still on the books, and that 1,595 works on theology had been borrowed. The Central Committee had heard of thirty-one people who had joined Unitarian congregations through the agency of Postal Missions.

A strong plea was made for further development of the Unitarian Workers' Union, so that religious conviction might be more fully translated into deeds, concerned with every aspect of daily life. Special interest was expressed in the development of the "Young People's Religious Union."

The Report included most interesting references to the Dutch Postal Mission in connection with the Protestantenbond and the Melbourne Postal Mission, also to the work of the village congregation at Bedfield, in Suffolk, under the care of the Rev. A. Amey, and to the re-opening of Spain-lane Chapel, Boston. The books of the Travelling Library had been much in demand, and this branch of the work could be greatly extended if more funds were available.

The Treasurer's statement showed that receipts for the general fund and the Suffolk Village mission amounted together to £314 1s. 10d., including a grant of £50 from the B. and F.U.A. for Bedfield and Framlingham. Subscriptions to the general fund showed an increase of £11 1s., being £84 2s. 6d. Special donations had been raised for the Boston services, and some further donations had balanced the accounts, but left nothing in hand. The Committee, strongly impressed by the value of the Suffolk Village mission work, appeal for a continuance of the support given for the past three years, and ask for additional subscriptions of some £20.

The Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG, in moving the adoption of the report, said that the Postal Mission was essentially women's work, and while the ultimate ideal was as much co-operation between men and women as possible, there was clearly a sphere for such work carried on by women alone, who were qualified for it in many ways, in which the average man was not. The great helpfulness of Postal Mission work depended almost wholly on the touch of personal sympathy, which the ladies who undertook the correspondence were so well able to give, showing how Unitarian Christianity touched life at every point. Since first he heard of the Postal Mission from the Brooke Herfords, it had attracted him as a specially beautiful and wise kind of work, having one great advantage over other kinds of religious work—that it acted by an absolute system of natural selection. They were brought into connection only with those who desired help and counsel, having the guarantee of a certain amount of responsiveness in the first reply of correspondents. The work had now been going on long enough to show tangible results, among which they could reckon more than one young minister, drawn to them in the first instance through the Postal Mission.

With all his heart and soul he believed in the Gospel which for good or ill bore the name of Unitarian. They were sometimes told that the old controversies were over; but he did not find it so. They were troubling the heart and soul of multitudes of their brethren at the present time. Very many were feeling about for an interpretation of religion which they could honestly accept with their understanding. Many minds were so constituted that the sweeping away of the whole of that scholastic theology which gathered about the history of the doctrine of the Trinity was necessary before they could get the clear light of religion, undisturbed and unbroken in their hearts. They wanted to be able to pray to God simply and straightforwardly, without any theological conditions to fulfil. They desired to believe heart and soul in the thing Jesus taught, that God is Father and that we may approach Him as children approach their father, without any of those subtleties of which even the most liberal orthodoxy was full. They were told that their theology was very bare and naked and vague; but to many minds it was very simple, something that could be apprehended. He was amazed when he read many of the books of orthodox or semi-orthodox apologists, to find into what fine-spun theories the readers were invited, and how preachers of great repute and of real power over a large class of minds still lived in what seemed to him the haze and maze of that theology. There was a large and rapidly-growing class of men who wanted not those fine-spun theories, but a simple religion which could be summed up in the words of Jesus respecting the love of God and the love of man, undisturbed by the philosophical difficulties some found in that religion, able to accept it, to feed on it, and live in it, when it was fairly and clearly presented to them. And they of the Postal Mission were doing an immeasurable good to these brethren and sisters of theirs in putting them in the way to become acquainted with that simple Unitarian gospel which, he believed, summed up the teaching of Jesus Christ. He was more and more impressed by the value of that gospel as encouraging absolute honesty of mind. The intellectual habit of continually trying to fit their religion into old formularies, to make them hold present-day religion, however well meant, tended to lead men into sophistications all round the sphere of the ethical life, and their commercial and political morality suffered in consequence. When men's religion was simpler, their lives would be simpler too, and they would be clear of those great evils which so much darkened and oppressed the moral life of their country.

Miss LUCAS seconded the resolution, and dwelt upon the wide extent of the work and the great good accomplished at very small expense. She emphasised the need of practical fidelity, since "one truth lived was better than a thousand uttered." Their work might be greatly extended, for there were many large towns in which nothing was done. Whoever would try would find the work most fascinating and rich in interest.

The Rev. W. C. HALL spoke of the revival of the congregation at Boston, which had been greatly stimulated by the help of the Union of Women Workers.

The Rev. E. DARLYN dwelt on the value of reading-circles, and in encouraging a knowledge of vital religious literature.

Mr. MARKHAM and Mr. JENKINS, two Postal Mission correspondents, also spoke, bearing testimony to the value of the work, and the resolution was unanimously adopted.

In response to a cordial welcome to foreign visitors, Miss Van Eck, of Oegstgeest, near Leiden, gave a most interesting address on Postal Mission work in Holland.

THE DUTCH POSTAL MISSION.

Miss VAN ECK first tendered to the meeting the greetings of the Dutch Postal Mission Committee of the Protestantenbond, of which she was the representative, and of which she spoke as the child of the English Postal Mission. In 1894 Miss Knappert had stayed with friends in Liverpool and was present at a meeting of the Postal Mission at the Institute. That meeting and conference with Miss Johnson, one of the Liverpool workers, had given her a strong impression of the value and soundness of the work, and she returned home determined, if possible, to introduce the Postal Mission into her own country. In face of many doubts, a meeting was held at Leiden in October, 1895, called by the Special Committee of the Protestantenbond, and the Dutch Postal Mission was established. Three ladies, of whom Miss Van Eck was one, first undertook the work. Advertisements were published in different papers, usually headed, "What Free Christians believe," and offering to lend books to anyone interested in the subject, the names and addresses being added of those to whom application should be made. The books were sent by parcels' post and might be kept a month. The response was immediate and beyond all expectation of the workers, so that they look back upon these first months with delight. Indeed, the demand for books "was almost too much for the inexperienced foster-mothers, and, however great their joy, they could not help complaining of the prosperous growth of their daughter, as in August one complains of the warmth of the sun, however dearly beloved." "She outgrew all her clothes," Miss Van Eck added, for there were not books enough to meet all the demands; but the Protestantenbond loyally supplied the need, and two years later the number of workers was doubled by the addition of another lady and two gentlemen. The library of the Mission is now well furnished, and the catalogue, which is regularly revised at the half-yearly meetings of the Mission, includes over 600 volumes. As in this country, correspondence is a chief part of the work, and Miss Van Eck gave a number of deeply interesting instances of the help which the Mission had brought to people of the most various conditions, troubled with religious difficulties and hungering for sympathy. To show that scepticism is not the necessary result of a revolt from orthodoxy, that the religion of Jesus can grapple with all the social questions of the day, that freedom of thought is consistent with veneration for the Bible and a life of true devotion, to liberate from the dread of perverted doctrine into the joy of trust in the Divine Love, and the simplicity of prayer—these are instances of the helpful ministry granted to the Postal Mission workers.

In six years the Mission sent out 5,000 parcels, containing as many as 17,000 books, which are often read not by one person only but by whole families and their friends. Applications come from all parts of Holland, and from Belgium and even America.

The Address concluded as follows:—"I have asked myself in great earnest: What is wanted to keep our work on the high level in which it stands? I am convinced it must be that we correspondents stand in life, that we have a true, full, deep life, are concerned in all the religious and ethical and social questions that move our society nowadays. I know by experience how much your readers appreciate that your own strong conviction does not prevent you from understanding their views and ideas. What we wish is to be a help for forming character. This means at the same time that our aim is not, and never may be, to make Unitarians, but to inspire those who appeal to us with a living faith and sound conviction. That is our Ideal! We feel how responsible our work is and how little we are up to our task. But we cannot help doing what we feel as our high calling to do. So we work in simplicity, feeling that we know little, but that it is a blessing to strive with others after the things eternal. Being conscious of the greatness and the holiness of our task, we put off our shoes from off our feet, knowing the place whereon we stand is holy ground. We are dealing with the inner life of man, which means the holy of holies. And because we know this, we never will submit to sectarianism, but will stand in the service of free religion."

At the conclusion of Miss Van Eck's address the Rev. N. JOZAN, of Budapest, tendered the greetings of his people, and spoke of the coming celebrations at Kolozsvár, in connection with the opening of the new College buildings, when he hoped that a party of English visitors would be present, whom they would be delighted to welcome.

On the motion of the Rev. W. TUDOR JONES, seconded by Miss MAUGHAN, the officers and committee for the ensuing year were appointed, and the meeting was brought to a close.

"THE daily round, the common task," are enough field for our littleness; and therein may we find hourly opportunity of imitating Christ, and asking what God's will is, and doing and submitting to it, and believing it right and best.—Charles Hargrove.

WINIFRED HOUSE.

INVALID CHILDREN'S CONVALESCENT NURSING HOME.

THE annual meeting of subscribers and friends of Winifred House was held on Monday last at Dr. Williams's Library, the chair being taken by Lieut.-Colonel MONTEFIORE, R.A., Secretary of the Medical and Convalescent Sub-Committee of the Charity Organisation Society.

Mr. W. M. BLYTH, hon. treas., read the financial report, which showed a slight increase in the subscriptions, and a large addition in the donation list, due to the gift of £500 from the executors of the late J. W. Bentley, Esq., out of an amount left by him for distribution among charitable institutions, and a further sum of £25 given in a similar manner by the executors of Mrs. Jane Turner. These donations have enabled the treasurer to invest £400. The remainder, together with subscriptions, donations, maintenance fees, &c., amounted to £875, while the expenditure was £750, so that there was a balance of £125 to commence the new year; though it must be remembered that this is partly made up of subscriptions paid in advance.

Miss M. PRITCHARD, hon. sec., then read the annual report, which commenced by summarising what had been done in the ten years' work which was completed in April last. Four hundred and two children had been received in Winifred House during that period. The length of stay for "carrying" cases, i.e., hip and spinal diseases and rickets, has varied from six months to two, or even three, years, while in that of children suffering from debility after surgical operation, illness, &c., the usual time spent in the home was from one to three months. The results have been excellent in the vast majority of cases, very few children having returned home without having derived distinct benefit. The financial condition during the ten years has been healthy, although at times there has been some little anxiety on account of expenditure with regard to the building itself, which constantly needs some repairs, and also it is earnestly desired that the subscription list should be increased, as it is to that upon which the Home depends for its steady support. Among the contributions of the past ten years it is pleasant to note that no less than £267 has been contributed by the readers of Young Days, principally made up of collections from among our Sunday-schools up and down the country for the Young Days' cot, and to this must be added the further sum of £91 collected by the Effra-road School for a special Brixton cot. Such gifts are, indeed, "twice blessed," for it is good to arouse in our children the desire to help those who are weak and ill.

During the past year fifty-three children have been received, seventeen of whom wore instruments of some kind. The average number of beds in use has been barely sixteen, fully half of which have been occupied by "carrying" cases. The work has gone on well, and no inroad of infectious disease has come to interfere with its steady progress. In conclusion, friends were reminded that May 1 this year was noteworthy as the twenty-fifth anniversary of the opening of "Mrs. Hampson's Home," in which for thirteen years she did such splendid work, and the report closed with the words, "We cannot help feeling that in Winifred House, as at present constituted, no more fitting memorial of a good woman's life could be found; and we trust that the labours on behalf of poor little delicate children will continue to be carried on, both in her name and in her loving spirit, for many years to come."

The CHAIRMAN, in moving the adoption of the report, spoke of the pleasure it gave him to be present; first, because he had had the pleasure of knowing Mrs. Hampson in former years, when she was living in Bowdon; and to know, was to highly esteem her and to value her friendship; and second, because he had watched with interest the work done at Winifred House for several years, and had noted the good management and loving care bestowed upon its inmates. Referring to a visit he had paid to the Home during the last week Colonel Montefiore said, "What I saw and heard strengthened my former opinion of the very excellent work which was being done there. Not only were the bodily illnesses of the children looked after, but all was done in a truly religious spirit to make them happier and better in mind." Then after remarking on the economy with which the "business" of the Home was conducted, the Chairman concluded by emphasising the last paragraph of the report (given above) which he once more read to the audience.

The Rev. WM. WOODING seconded the adoption of the report with a few kindly remarks, and the resolution was then put and carried.

Mr. T. PALLISTER YOUNG moved a resolution thanking the officers and Committee, re-electing them, with the addition of Miss Bertha Pritchard to the Committee. After speaking in very warm terms of the spirit in which the work was done, he said that he had seen a paper that had been drawn up for the guidance of the Lady Probationers which showed clearly how they were trained to undertake their duties from a high standpoint, the rules finishing with the well-known lines of Coleridge:—

O'er wayward Childhood would'st thou hold firm rule,
And sun thee in the light of happy faces?
Love, Hope and Patience, these must be thy graces,
And in thy own heart let them first keep school.

Miss HOLBORN seconded the resolution, which was then put and carried unanimously.

Miss MARIAN PRITCHARD proposed a vote of thanks to the Medical officers and to Miss Emma Hope, the lady superintendent of Winifred House, whose devoted care so much of the well-being of the Home depended. She also referred to the ill-health of Mr. Robert Hampson, who deeply regretted his inability to be present.

Mrs. BLYTH seconded this resolution, mentioning several instances of children she had sent to the Home, who had made such excellent progress while there that both she and their parents felt most grateful. This resolution having been put and carried,

Dr. URBAN PRITCHARD thanked Colonel Montefiore, in the name of the meeting, for presiding, for it was a special boon when an expert, as the Colonel was, seeing that for seventeen years he had taken up this subject in connection with the Charity Organisation Society, came forward and expressed so warmly his satisfaction with the work carried on at Winifred House.

The CHAIRMAN having responded, the meeting was brought to a close.

IMPRESSIONS OF WHIT-WEEK.

VI.

THE general spirit and temper of the meetings struck me as being remarkably fine. I think we have a right to be proud of our people when we see with what patience, nay, with what generosity, they will listen to opinions different from their own when they are expressed with evident sincerity and conviction.

One thought suggested by the meetings was that God had given into the hands of the Unitarians of England and America an unexpected piece of helpful work. It is our sympathy and support and encouragement that is to be a source of helpfulness to many a liberal religious thinker or worker holding an isolated post in the midst of sacerdotal and materialistic influences in other lands.

The session most stimulating and bracing to me was that of Thursday morning. Mr. Carpenter, in his compact address, laid a broad basis for the Council to work on, and indicated the lines on which a "world-religion" might ultimately be raised. Dr. Crothers, in his beautiful speech, caught us up into the heights and made us see and feel that the religion of the world is ever in process of making. Then Graham Wallas, in that masterly and terse summary in which he presented the political aspirations and ideals of the day to us naked, stripped of the gaudy trappings in which they are often wrapped, made his demand for a "world-ethic." We could "sympathise" with Mr. Wallas in his lack of confidence in the ability of Christianity to supply such a world-ethic and his feeling that Buddhism could; but most of us, I imagine, would feel that the characteristic teachings of spiritual Christianity are more fitted to become universal than those of Buddhism. The address of Graham Wallas made a deep impression on me. Oh! for a man of commanding moral power to refine and chasten this pulsing sense of world-power amongst the people, to ennoble it and to turn it on to lines that shall lead it into ways of peace and cause its great force to be expended in helpfulness.

Mr. Armstrong's paper on the Friday morning impressed me with a further sense of the "fogs" in which the New Orthodoxy (which, according to the accepted standards, is rank heresy) is clouding religion. It is a pity we did not have Mrs. Ward's paper on "The Preservation of the Christian Ideal amid changing Forms of Thought" to supplement and balance the address of Graham Wallas and the paper by Mr. Armstrong.

Dr. Crothers and M. Fontanès impressed me by their oratorical gifts, not that I understood the latter, but his manner of speech was charming. Mr. V. Tchertkoff I think we should welcome for himself alone, not merely as Tolstoy's friend. It was pleasant to meet old friends from far and near, and not least to see Signor Bracciforti once again, with his cheerful optimism undimmed, and his faith in the future of Italy undiminished.

Accrington. WALTER H. BURGESS.

VII.

DURING most of the meetings at Essex Hall I sat beside a little old lady from some far-off, lonely place in the north of Scotland, and when, after having sat out the very last cheers that accompanied the very final sentence spoken at the meetings, we parted, she said to me, her sweet old face radiant with satisfaction: "Oh, dear, I feel just like a boa-constrictor"—and, of course, I understood her.

My fellow-traveller writes to me, now that we are both safely back in our homes: "I feel as if some mighty swelling ocean had passed over my soul, and that I have been in communication with powers stronger than I have ever known before." And, of course, that too is exactly what I feel. And as THE INQUIRER turns up with its "Impressions of Whit-week," I feel as if I could sign almost every one of the articles under that heading.

And this is, to me, the great wonder of those wonderful meetings, that all these men and women from all parts of the world seemed to hold the same views about all the great questions of Life, to have but one mutual "knowledge of Good and Evil." As they rose and spoke, those men from Russia and Italy, India or America, born and bred under totally different social and religious circumstances and relations, they seemed in their search for Truth to have come to be filled with the same cravings and longings, inspired by the same hopes and aspirations, drawn towards the same ideals, and borne up by the same strong firm faith in one true God, the loving Father of all living creatures, thus bearing witness that Religion, when purged of sectarian ideas, delivered from the fetters of doctrines and creeds, is the light in which men come to see things as they are, the light by which we may discern this world as it is meant to be, and as it shall, by God's mercy, some day become—very good to behold.

And as I sat listening, with my head whirling with excitement and over-exertion, my heart was quiet and at rest, full of grateful wonder, that I should be a member of this great world-wide congregation of fearless, truth-seeking, law-abiding, Godfearing men and women, whose foremost man has said, "That he who seeks shall find, and that those who will do God's will, shall know the Truth." And I felt that through this knowledge a new strength had come to me on which I might hope to lean in those lonely anxious hours that come to all who cannot honestly walk the trodden path, but have been so called that they must follow their own way or "lose their own soul."

Review of Reviews.

THE TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

THE annual meeting of the Essex Hall Temperance Association was held, as we have already recorded, on the evening of Whit Monday at Essex Hall, the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed in the chair. Among the letters received from members unable to be present was one from the Rev. C. Hargrove, in which he expressed his regret that he had not been a total abstainer at least during the whole of his ministerial life. There was also a letter from the Rev. Dr. Drummond, of Manchester College, in which he said that if he had been present, he would have been obliged to oppose the change in the name of the Association proposed by the Committee. At the conclusion of the meeting the Committee's proposal was brought forward on the motion of Mr. T. P. Young, and after discussion it was agreed by an overwhelming majority, that the name of the society should in future be "The National Unitarian Temperance Association." The Committee had found that for practical purposes they needed a denominational name, and that ultimately adopted was clearly the only one acceptable to a very large majority of the members present.

The CHAIRMAN, in moving the adoption of the report, said that he had recently been much impressed by reading the great book on the Temperance question by Rowntree and Sherwell. It contained most exhaustive evidence on all kinds of questions, gathered with infinite patience; and the overwhelming impression it left on the reader was of the terrific task before the reformers, and an infectious faith derived from the authors, that the task could and must be accomplished. The road was clear. What must be done was known. The difficulty in doing it was not in the obscurity of the problem, but the huge mass of indifference and carelessness, and the terrific commercial interests at stake. A large and influential portion of the community did not in any sense desire temperance reform and looked with the suspicious hatred of those whose interest was threatened on any attempt likely to have an appreciable effect on the diminution even of drunkenness in the country. A man's pecuniary interest exercised a most subtle influence on his ways of looking at things, from the most elementary moral question upwards. One of the root reforms of which Rowntree and Sherwell saw the necessity was to put things in such a position that there could not be persons whose private and personal interests should be on the side of drunkenness, on the side of the ruin of England as against its salvation. They had to wage war on a compact, well-organised and enormously wealthy interest, which had control of political machinery, and with some reason claimed to have put the present Government in power. They must deliver themselves from that most shameful and degrading slavery, and by the same instrumentality of constitutional means by which they had been enslaved. And those whose pecuniary interest was in the liquor traffic, from the House of Lords to the pot-boy, must be delivered from that terrible and damning position. There was that great call to them on the political side. But their primary object was not political action. The measure of possible legislative success depended on the widening of public opinion, which must be worked at by private example, exhortation and effort. They must be ahead of legislation in their doctrine and practice. They must raise the high water-mark higher and higher while trying to prevent corrupt and sinister influences from preventing the legislation for which public opinion was rife.

Mrs. H. S. SOLLY seconded the motion and made a powerful appeal for total abstinence, especially for the children's sake.

The report having been adopted, the appointment of the officers and Committee, with the Earl of Carlisle as President, was moved by Mr. D. S. MILLER and seconded by the Rev. L. G. WILSON, of Hopedale, Mass., who brought the greetings of the Temperance societies connected with the Unitarian Churches of America. In his country, he said, intemperance was practically confined to two classes—the idle rich and the submerged class. The reform movement with them had originated contemporaneously with the anti-slavery struggle. They realised now that the evil of intemperance was so subtle it could not be voted out of existence, but by personal effort they must use methods that would bring about a saner social condition. The development of healthier interests, such as the bicycle and the growing study of electricity, was the most powerful enemy of intemperance.

On the motion of the Rev. W. G. TARRANT, seconded by Mr. H. G. CHANCELLOR, it was agreed that the affiliation fee for Temperance societies should be reduced from 2s. 6d. to 1s.

The Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG then moved a resolution in support of the Bill to prohibit the sale of drink to children under sixteen years of age. He said that there was no hope of any facilities for the Children's Bill being got from the Government; or if, perhaps, amendments were accepted, they would be such as to destroy the use of the Bill. It had been suggested that the age should be reduced from sixteen to fourteen; but in other parts of the Empire it is actually eighteen or twenty-one, and the amendment, if made, must be upward not downward. The suggestion that the parent as well as the publican should be made liable was sinister, aiming to set the working classes against the measure. The friends of temperance were not half clever enough to oppose the wiles of the other side; yet the time would come when the moral sense of the English people would rise up in indignation as a great and overwhelming power, and all those awful pecuniary interests would be swept away. Then at last it would be understood that legislation was not a machinery for putting little doles of money into the pockets of favoured classes, nor for the battle of party against party and interest against interest, but a great power backed by wisdom and conscience, that might yet do something to save our country from degradation, and lift up its moral and social life to what the life of a Christian country ought to be.

The motion was seconded by the Rev. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, and unanimously adopted, after which came the discussion and resolution as to the change of name of the Association, to which we have already referred, and the meeting was brought to a close.

TEMPERANCE REFORM.

THE Rev. F. K. Freeston writes in this connection:—At the recent annual meeting of the late Essex Hall Temperance Association, the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed very strongly and deservedly recommended Rowntree and Sherwell's most valuable volume on "The Temperance Problem and Social Reform." The ninth edition, revised and enlarged, is published at six shillings, and those who can afford it ought certainly to buy it. But this same edition, abridged and not mutilated, may be had in popular form, and should by no means be despised. It retains within its 170 pages all the essential facts, the practical proposals, and sixteen of the illuminating maps, diagrams, and photographs. Moreover, where fullest details do not find room, references are given to the complete edition.

This smaller treatise, at least, should be in the hands of all our temperance workers. I should be glad, if I may be allowed, to supply a copy, post free, to the Superintendent or Secretary of any Band of Hope or Temperance Society belonging to our Conference Churches, or to any teacher of an adult class in our Sunday-schools.

Applications, stating church and minister, should be addressed to Essex House, Campden Hill, London, W.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Belfast Domestic Mission.—The annual Scholars' Floral Service was held on Sunday, June 16. There was a good attendance of scholars and friends. The service was conducted by our pastor, the Rev. G. J. Slipper, special music being rendered by the scholars for the occasion. The church was tastefully decorated by some of the elder members of the Sunday-school the previous evening. At the close of the service a collection was taken up in aid of the Royal Victoria Hospital, Belfast.

Bradford.—Last Sunday special services were held at Chapel-lane Chapel, in celebration of the 239th anniversary of the founding of the congregation on the enforcement of the Act of Uniformity in 1662, and the 182nd anniversary of the opening of the first chapel on the present site, in 1719. The Rev. E. Ceredig Jones (the pastor), who was the preacher for the day, gave a short sketch of the early history of the congregation. The choir of men and boys was assisted by Miss Marie Simpson, who sang the solos, "The King of Love" and "Glory to Thee" (Gounod). Miss Simpson also took part in the duet "I waited for the Lord" (Mendelssohn), and the trio "Protect us through the coming night" (Curschmann). There were large congregations.

Liverpool: North End Domestic Mission.—The annual meeting was held on Monday last, Mr. Charles W. Jones in the chair. Letters of apology from Mr. Alfred Booth, Mr. R. Robinson, and J. H. Burroughs were read. Mr. Jones, in moving—"That this meeting desires to express its cordial sympathy with the missionaries in their work, and congratulate them on the success they had attained, and assure them of continued and hearty support," said that the work being done was worthy of the highest praise, and particularly that part among the young men and women who had become associated with the Mission. Their evenings and holidays were usefully and pleasantly enjoyed at the Mission instead of aimlessly spent walking about the streets. He undertook during the next twelve months to carry out some scheme for providing the further accommodation asked for by Mr. Haigh in his report, or connected with their churches. He had often been told that they had no poor in their parish. His reply was the whole of Liverpool was their parish, and they had connected with their churches three Missions—two at the North and one at the South end—at each of which was a chapel-of-ease. He was glad to say that the missionaries went in amongst the poor to cheer and help them, and make their lives brighter and happier rather than to preach. The Rev. R. A. Armstrong, in seconding, said he felt the greatest admiration for their missionaries and the work that they did at this Mission, where they had little outside help, and were largely dependent upon the young men and women they had trained. Mr. Haigh, in reply to the vote of sympathy, said that he had felt that something must be done to relieve the oppressive monotony of the daily routine of those who came to the Mission, and that new means must be provided, and he had tried what could be done not only to amuse but also to interest and help them, and he had met with greater response than he had anticipated. Miss Wells also returned thanks. The report and financial statement were adopted, on the motion of the Rev. Dr. Klein, seconded by the Rev. H. W. Hawkes; the committee was appointed for the ensuing year, and a vote of thanks to Mr. C. W. Jones, as president and chairman of that meeting, closed the proceedings.

London: Wood Green.—Last Sunday was the Sunday-school anniversary. Dr. Mummery preached in the morning on "Hope," in the evening on "David Serving his Generation." The congregation was good, the music special, and the hall exquisitely decorated with flowers. The chief feature of the day was the charming rendering of a flower service (Sunday School Association) by the children in the afternoon. In perfect harmony with the same was a bright and attractive address by Mr. D. D. Evans on "Flower Symbolism." The afternoon offertory and the flowers were handed over to the Wood Green Cottage Hospital.

Poole.—The Sunday-school Anniversary and Flower Services were held on Sunday last. The church was tastefully decorated with flowers, and the sermons were preached by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie. In the afternoon Mr. Bowie gave an interesting address on "The Education Question," which was followed by discussion.

South Wales: Clydach Vale.—The anniversary services were held on Sunday, June 16, at the Co-operative Hall, Tonypandy. The Rev. J. Tyssul Davis, B.A., Cardiff, officiated with our minister, the Rev. D. Rees. The Rev. J. Tyssul Davis's sermon in the afternoon was delivered in English, all the rest of the services were carried on in the mother-tongue. The congregations and the amount of the collections were very satisfactory.

The History of Herod; or, Another Look at a Man emerging from Twenty Centuries of Calumny.

By JOHN VICKERS.

CONTENTS.—Chap. I. The Jewish Priest Rule. II. Herod's Advancement. III. His Civilising Rule. IV. His Reformed Religion. V. His Alleged Cruelties. VI. His Family Troubles. VII. The Antipater Plot.

"Although the writer adds no new matter to the story told by Josephus, and although he takes the part of an advocate rather than that of a judge, yet his reading of the text is so fair, and the consequent inferences are so reasonable that he may be justly held to have earned for his client the favourable verdict of posterity."—Westminster Review.

"There can be no doubt that one will be better able to judge intelligently, not only of Herod as a man and a ruler, but also of the Jewish nation from the time of the return from Babylon till its final overthrow by the Romans, after reading this book. In the case of a ruler whose reputation has come to us only through the word of bitter enemies, it is but fair to cross examine the witnesses."—The Unitarian (Chicago).

"Other historians take Josephus as their authority and guide in judging of the moral character of Herod, and of the various tragic events and actions of his life, and too often apparently without a thought of questioning the truth of the record or the justness of the inferences and conclusions. Hence the value of a writer like Vickers, who does challenge both the accuracy of Josephus and the justness of his inferences, and in some cases with considerable acumen and insight."—The Inquirer.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE address given by Mr. John Dendy as President of the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire at the recent meeting at Oldham, will be published in full in next week's INQUIRER. The Assembly sermon, by the Rev. R. Travers Herford, with the title "Back to Jesus," has now been published by Messrs. H. Rawson and Co., New Brown-street, Manchester. Of the International Council papers, we intend to publish next week the Rev. J. Hocart's on "The Struggle with Catholicism in Belgium," and perhaps Professor Boros's on "Present-day Religious Problems in Hungary," and in the following week the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed's on "Wordsworth's Ideals and the Nineteenth Century."

THURSDAY next is Speech Day at Willaston School, and we trust that there will be a large attendance of guests interested in the school and the higher education of our boys. The first year's work has, we believe, been thoroughly satisfactory, and Thursday will afford a very pleasant opportunity of seeing the school and its surroundings and hearing of its methods. We specially commend the occasion to parents who might contemplate sending their boys to the school. Anyone interested in Willaston, who has not yet received an invitation, should apply at once to the Clerk to the Governors, Mr. E. W. Marshall, 38, Barton-arcade, Manchester.

THE "Pilgrimage" to Catterick on Saturday, July 13, promoted by the Tees-side Committee of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association, as a Twentieth Century Commemoration of Theophilus Lindsey, promises to be an occasion of great interest and enjoyment. The promoters have issued a little pamphlet with full particulars, which may be had from the secretary, Mr. L. Worstenholm, 30, Crescent-road, Middlesbro', with whom intending visitors should at once communicate. To all such we command also the reading of Miss F. E. Cooke's charming little book, "The Story of Theophilus Lindsey" (1s.), published by the Sunday School Association at Essex Hall.

ON Tuesday Miss Hobhouse gave at Oxford the address which she has not yet been allowed to give in London on the condition of the women and children in the concentration camps in South Africa. It is lamentable that this painful subject, which appeals directly to our common humanity, should have been mixed up with the bitterness of party politics. At Oxford the chair was taken by Sir William Markby, and at the conclusion of Miss Hobhouse's address the Master of Balliol, in moving a vote of thanks, said that if the facts about the concentration camps were thoroughly known to the people of this country such a state of things would not be allowed to go on.

"KING ALFRED, Patron-Saint of England," is the title of a striking sermon preached last Sunday in Winchester Cathedral, by Dr. Charles W. Stubbs, Dean of Ely, at the Summer Assembly of the National Home Reading Union, and now published by Warren and Sons, of 85, High-street, Winchester. The Dean quotes Freeman's praise of the great English King :—

Alfred is the most perfect character in history. He is a singular instance of a prince who has become a hero of romance, who, as a hero of romance, has had countless imaginary exploits and imaginary institutions attributed to him, but to whose character romance has done no more than justice, and who appears in exactly the same light in history and fable. No other man on record has ever so thoroughly united all the virtues both of the ruler and the private man. In no other man on record were so many virtues disfigured by so little alloy. A saint without superstition, a warrior, all whose wars were fought in defence of his country, a conqueror whose laurels were never stained by cruelty, a prince never cast down by adversity, never lifted up to insolence in the hour of triumph —there is no other name in history to compare with his.

And then Dr. Stubbs takes several of the chief points in this panegyric, and illustrates them by passages from Alfred's writings, which show what manner of man he was. The King, he says, though not to be called a born poet, was something far higher and better.

An inspired man—there is only one inspiration, remember, for there is only One Holy Spirit—pouring out to us Englishmen of to-day, as to our countrymen of a thousand years ago, the deep feelings of a heart full of the sense of God's presence always and everywhere, of a soul which hungered and thirsted after righteousness with all the simple devotion of a child-like spirit, which loved and longed for goodness, with all the free enthusiasm of a brave and manly nature, which above all bore witness that, for King, as well as for people, the duty-ideal, which because it is the Christ-ideal, has the mark of wounds upon it, is still the highest and purest and best of all human ambitions.

Alfred died a thousand years ago, in the first year of the tenth century, leaving Edward his son to reign in his stead. Victoria the Well-Beloved died in the first year of the twentieth century, and leaves her son Edward to reign in her stead. Thus the preacher points to a striking coincidence, and from deeper reasons draws a lesson of what is now demanded of the English people, as a thousand years ago Alfred declared the inner secret of true empire, in the words: "England needs not only good war-men and good workmen, but also good prayer-men."

THE address given by the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, M.A., at the recent annual meeting of the Friends' Anti-Vivisection Association at Devonshire House, has been separately printed, and will, we trust, be widely read. It deals with the moral aspect of the question as affecting personal character and duty. The charge that the opponents of Vivisection are guilty of excessive care for the welfare of animals at the cost of indifference to human suffering must be borne, Mr. Wicksteed says, with equanimity. Every moral question is advanced by the special interest and devotion of a few, and he who helps any moral cause, thereby helps all; and this special cause is urged in the interest of humanity, no less than of the animals. "It is not those who object to humanity being neglected, but those who object to animals being considered that bring this charge against us."

As soon as scientific men take a wide view of their functions our cause will be won, for in truth it is not for animals only that we are pleading, but for humanity also; and when science has taken a point of view at once more lofty and practical, when a more generous culture has robbed specialising of its moral and intellectual dangers, but left it its efficiency as an instrument of research, then the evil and the folly of the practices which we denounce and oppose will be seen in all their nakedness. For the ultimate object of all who have influence in the direction of human life, under its practical, intellectual or emotional aspects, must be to establish the fullest possible harmony between humanity and the permanent and essential conditions that surround and control it. And this harmony must not be regarded as resting on a merely physical relation, but as being moral, spiritual and emotional also. Who is there that does not acknowledge that his own well-being consists not exclusively in the absence of physical pain and the presence of the sources and conditions of physical pleasure, but also in the moral, spiritual and emotional relations in which he finds himself with human beings, the animate and inanimate nature around him, and the all-embracing and all-pervading Spirit in whom we live and have our being? The man who in advocating any line of supposed progress finds himself attempting to benefit humanity by securing some degree of physical comfort at the expense of establishing a spiritual discord between man and his surroundings, should surely ask himself whether he is not misconceiving the essential conditions and objects of human action.

The physical welfare of man may not be sought at the cost of the torture of animals, and while a certain kind of knowledge may be gained, the question, Mr. Wicksteed urges, is "whether the direction of the intellect along those lines is relatively fruitful, whether it does not divert the attention of scientific men from more or less intellectually fruitful plots of research, while at the same time materialising and morally degrading not only the operators themselves, but the whole society to which they belong, and which supports them." As to the relative humanity of English investigators, and the danger of trusting to the specialist's judgment in any branch of life, unchecked by a wholesome public opinion, Mr. Wicksteed adds some weighty words, and pleads that our English investigators ought to be the first to welcome the vigilance of public opinion, as a defence against unworthy members of their own fraternity and the deadening influence of habit and association.

IN sending a copy of Mr. Wicksteed's Address to Ministers, whose names appear in our "Year Book," Miss Frances Power Cobbe, President of the British Union for Abolition of Vivisection (20, Triangle, Bristol), has written as follows:—

The subject is one which appears to me to have strong claims on the attention of ministers of religion, and specially on that of all who hold and teach the blessed doctrine of the absolute goodness of God. Roman Catholics (as Cardinal Vaughan has just shown us), and perhaps Romanising English Churchmen with him, may draw lines of scholastic distinction between human persons and such mere things as the noble horse and devoted dog; and conceive it possible that the Lord of All intends us to find the way to our bodily salvation by torturing them and causing their whole existence to have been a misfortune and a curse. In your view, I trust, as in mine, such a doctrine is nothing short of impious; and its revival in our day when Darwinism has so largely bridged over the chasm between us and our humbler fellow creatures, a portentous example of the wide-extending, never-dying poison of a false theology.

Surely it is fitting that the leaders of free religious thought in England should raise their voices above all others, clearly and distinctly for mercy—nay, rather I should say, for justice—to the brutes; and proclaim as a fundamental principle of their morality, that (as old Cicero said):—"Nothing is expedient but what is right; and it is not right because it is expedient, but expedient because it is right." It is astounding that those who profess to consider the interests of human souls as so transcendant that the (supposed) soulless brutes can, in comparison, have no claims on us at all, are yet coming forward in support of a practice which—whether it may or may not conduce to the health of human bo*dies*—must, in the very nature of things, harden human hearts. If the author of the Book of Proverbs said truly: "The merciful man doeth good to his own soul," assuredly the merciless vivisector doeth to his own soul—and to the souls of all his pupils and assistants—the deadliest of conceivable injuries.

THE paper on "The Influence of Thought on Character," by Mr. Bertram Talbot, the greater part of which was, at the time of its first appearance, printed in these columns, with the series of notable extracts under the heading "Remember!" has now been reissued by Mr. Philip Green, and may be had at Essex Hall, at the cost of 6d. per dozen or 3s. per 100, post free. Mr. Talbot has also issued a leaflet against smoking, addressed to boys, which may be had from him at 86, Cromwell-avenue, Highgate, N., in quantities of 24 for 6d. The leaflet gives five reasons why a boy smokes, of which the last is as follows:—

(5.) Because he thinks it is "manly," for "do not most men smoke?" This is ridiculous. And yet it is a strangely common delusion. Manly, indeed! Why! Baden-Powell is not a smoker. Is there a British boy who would say that the hero of Mafeking lacks one of the qualities that go to make a "manly" man? Surely not. Read his own words, written from the Transvaal in July, 1900, to English boys. He says: "A feeble youth who smokes because he thinks it is manly is just as liable to drink or to swear because he has known grown men to do it." Quite so. Make no mistake about it. Neither by smoking, nor by drinking, nor by swearing, can a youth show himself manly, but by resisting temptation, by practising self-control, and by acting nobly.

Then follow four reasons why no boy should smoke, of which the first and last are these:—

(1.) Because even a little is harmful to him, while habitual smoking seriously weakens one, or several organs of his body; sometimes is the direct cause of death; frequently reduces the system to a low condition, thus rendering it unfit to fight against ailments brought on by other causes. The fully-developed man may throw off the evil effects of tobacco. The growing youth cannot. It finds out his weak points—eyes, lungs, brain, heart, nerves—and hinders them from becoming strong and healthy. There is no doubt whatever about this. Ask your doctor.

(4.) Because a boy has no craving for tobacco; in fact, not only does his system make no demand—as it does, say, for food, liquid, and warmth—but it actually revolts from it at first, the usual symptoms being faintness, giddiness, sickness. Question: Why create a want in order to satisfy that want?

"IF the Lord would give me wings I would fly," said Charles Wesley. John Wesley's answer, "If the Lord bids me fly I would trust Him for the wings," suggests the eternal power of the higher over the lower and the creative strength of right purpose. In one way or another the Lord bids us all fly, and we have need to trust Him for the wings and live in that intimate and close relation to Him that can alone receive the Divine guidance.—W. C. Gannett.

THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

SIR,—The successful and helpful meetings recently held in London have proved once more the importance of and the call for our message and work.

I think all will admit that the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, in organising these inspiring gatherings, performed a valuable service on behalf of Liberal Religion throughout the world.

The annual report of the ordinary work of the Association will be forwarded on application to any of your readers, and I hope its perusal will induce many of them to become subscribers to its funds. It will be a pleasure to enrol them as New Century members. I may add that a subscription of any amount entitles to membership.

THE SELECTION OF HYMNS.

SIR,—In your last issue Mr. Lummis takes exception to a hymn sung at the recent meeting of the Provincial Assembly, on account of its supposed "orthodoxy." He does not tell us what the hymn was, or mention the name of its author, but he gives sufficient clue to enable us to identify it as the one beginning "When the Lord of Love was here" by the Rev. Stopford Brooke, a beautiful hymn to which one would have thought there could be no possible objection. Mr. Lummis says it contains "a direct statement of the orthodox dogma of the two natures of Jesus Christ," and a prayer "to the Second Person in the Trinity," but no other Unitarian would perceive anything of the kind without a powerful microscope, or a strong imagination.

Prejudice is excited and a wrong impression is conveyed by saying that "it was written by an Anglican clergyman who has since seceded." The hymn appeared (for the first time, I believe) in "Christian Hymns," compiled by Mr. Stopford Brooke after he left the Church of England. There is far more reason to complain that the hymns selected for use at our united gatherings very seldom contain any reference to Jesus Christ, and are for the most part of a purely Theistic character. I hope that we are not to be still further restricted in the same direction by an absolute prohibition of all distinctively Christian hymns.

THE EDUCATION BILL.

The Report of the Committee of the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire.

I ALWAYS suspect my own judgment on the occasions (certainly rare) when it is at variance with that of my esteemed friend, the Rev. H. E. Dowson. But I feel obliged to dissent from the main drift of the above report, which we owe, it is understood, to his able and zealous pen.

I am quite unable to concur in the high estimate he has formed of the institution and work of the School Board, which we owe to the Elementary Education Act of 1870, and I venture to submit a few statements in opposition to his views.

I have long held the opinion that the School Board system was infected, on its initiation, with the virus of sectarianism and clericalism. The Act was so framed as to interfere as little as possible with the interests of the Voluntary Schools and their methods of dogmatic instruction, whilst, of course, presumably aiming at a large extension of national education. But it was by no means such a measure as was generally hoped for by Nonconformists. I fancy there are many members of the Assembly who fought hard and long against Mr. Forster and his Bill on this special ground. Nor did they object less strenuously to the mode of election prescribed as being novel, unsound, and partial. The cumulative vote suggested, and almost compelled, the presentment and predominance of sectarian considerations. It was of the nature of those fancy franchises which are so unsatisfactory a substitute for the decision of the simple majority. It led every sect to struggle for representation on the Board, that its interests might be jealously guarded. As is remarked by Mr. Lyulph Stanley in the May number of the Contemporary Review: "The moment people are put on a public board as advocates of interests, it will be found that they are apt to act on that board as advocates, and not as impartial colleagues." Surely this has been but too obvious in the case of many School Boards. Have we not seen, as a natural consequence, members sitting on them, not to extend, but to frustrate the extension of schools, lest those for which they are specially concerned should suffer by a dreaded rivalry and competition? We are told in the report that members of these boards "have been chosen ad hoc, being the pick of the community for educational work, and being the direct representatives of the ratepayers." On the latter clause I may have hereafter to remark. I only wish I could accept the former, for I have fancied, rightly or wrongly, that considerations of intellectual equipment, of a knowledge of educational principles, and familiarity with their operations have been somewhat less prominent than a connection with certain Churches, and a zeal for the protection of instruction in particular creeds and dogmas. As to "the control of the ratepayers," let it be remembered that their members are elected for a term of three consecutive years, during which they are beyond any control by those who appoint them. Again, they own no direct responsibility for the expenditure of their finances. All they have to do is to send a rescript to the local municipality for certain sums of money, and the latter (who are much more frequently answerable to the ratepayers) have no power to call in question the use they make of their resources. Surely it is a vicious principle that one authority should determine the amount to be expended, for which another body of representatives is compelled to levy the rate!

Is it not a dangerous thing to allow any public body—unchecked—to put their hands into the purse of a community? It may, at least, be conceded that these statements militate in some degree against the School Board system, both in theory and in practice.

Of the admirable services to the cause of popular education rendered by a large number of members, notwithstanding the difficulties and discouragements of their work, I cannot speak too highly. They have deserved general respect and gratitude, and it would be unpardonable not to recognise the invaluable services of many of them, including the cultivated and zealous women (not least in our own district) who have been distinguished alike for zeal and for administrative ability.

I turn now to the second main argument of the report, which states certain objections to the transfer of educational work, from the School Boards to the County and County Borough Councils, and the Committees, in the appointment of which they will have a large share.

I remember well the weighty opinion expressed by Mr. Bright during the agitation which preceded the Act of 1870—namely, that it was not desirable to invest new and untried authorities with the administration of a great educational measure. He preferred that the work should be entrusted to the municipal corporations, which, since their reform in 1835, had proved able, enterprising, and successful representatives of public opinion and interests; they were under the direct control of the people, and had justified general confidence. Now whilst these institutions are all but universal, it is admitted that School Boards cover only a very limited area; for, perhaps, one-third of the population of England and Wales they afford no provision, and what is more serious is the fact that of 2,345 School Boards in these countries no fewer than 1,233 have areas containing a population of less than 1,000. Indeed, one of them exercises its powers and authority over seventy-five persons, including children! It is not a cause for wonder that, under these circumstances, the report should admit that "the area is the one redeeming feature of the Bill," and that "the county area is in every way preferable."

I claim these concessions as potent arguments for the chief provision of the Bill—that there should be one effective authority, covering the whole country by its beneficent operations. This purpose would be largely promoted by entrusting new powers to County and County Borough Councils. Granting that the area is very important, the Report further remarks—"and there is the character of the authorities." I have previously referred to this essential qualification, and am prepared to contend that the municipalities have already proved themselves worthy of public approval in the administration of such (and they are not few) educational duties as have already been confided to them by the legislature. I suggest, without making invidious comparisons with School Boards or other public bodies, that they present a satisfactory average of ability, zeal, and competence in the administration of many large departments of the public service. I point to the fact that they have covered the land with 650 rate-aided free libraries and reading-rooms, and a considerable number of museums and schools of art. I speak from personal knowledge when I add that this work has been pervaded by a wise and catholic spirit, and that in the selection of their many millions of books and papers neither sectarian purposes nor party politics have been permitted to influence their decisions.

It is no slight evidence of their interest in popular education that almost every municipality has appropriated to that object the means so unexpectedly furnished by the Customs and Excise Act, 1890, commonly known as beer and whisky money. It was at their option to use the money in reduction of their rates; but with commendable judgment they applied it to the establishment of technical schools and the promotion of other departments of secondary education. Almost every large town is, or will shortly be, thus provided. In Manchester we anticipate the credit of having not alone the largest, but the most fully equipped school of the kind in England. Birmingham has, for some time, rejoiced in the best school of art; and the Nottingham Corporation has not only a fine free library and museum, but also administers the affairs of a University College.

It is not without significance that corporations deal with annual turnovers of many millions. As for instance, Manchester about 8 millions, Liverpool 6½, Birmingham 9, and the last estimate of the London County Council—a comparatively new body—for the year 1900 was nearly 4 millions. I suggest that men who have already done good educational work, and have the brain-power to deal competently with such vast sums as these, will prove at least as capable as other public bodies to undertake any further duties of the like kind that may be confided to them.

It is appropriate to remark that the Corporation Committees which for many years have made valuable contributions to the instruction of the people, are mostly of a hybrid kind—i.e., they call to their assistance certain experts in various branches of learning and the arts.

For example, the City Art Gallery of Manchester consists of fourteen Aldermen and Councillors, and seven representatives of the Royal Institution, which contains the permanent collection of pictures. The Technical School is managed by a committee on which are twenty-five members of the Corporation and twelve experts in various departments of mechanics, engineering and manufacture. Many Library Committees are conducted on the same principle. In each case the chairman is a member of the Corporation, exactly as recommended for adoption in the new Bill by Mr. Lyulph Stanley, because "the power to raise a rate is reserved to the Council, and not to be delegated to the Education Committee, as is surely reasonable and proper." In the same way the Education Committees of the County and Borough Councils would be composed, with the aid of a given number of educational experts, male and female, and of other students of school methods.

I hope that, in considering the new Bill and any subsequent developments of it, the friends of education will discharge from their minds all party or political bias, and deal with the case on its own merits. Its fundamental principle has already been approved by several very important authorities, by the Liverpool Corporation, and by a Conference held in the Manchester Town Hall, at which were present representatives of the Technical Schools of fourteen County and Borough Councils. The Assistant Masters' Association (Lancashire and Cheshire Branch), at a recent meeting held at the Hulme Grammar School, reviewed certain resolutions with approval, which had been passed by their Executive. The first and most important runs thus:—

This Association welcomes the Government Education Bill in that it constitutes the County or County Borough Councils the local education authority; that it makes the residue of the Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Act, 1890, applicable to education other than primary, and that it is designed to prevent competition between existing education authorities; and, secondly, it welcomes the statement of the Duke of Devonshire that it is intended to include experts in the proposed Education Committee.

In conclusion, I frankly admit that, if regarded as a complete scheme, the Bill is eminently unsatisfactory. But it will be a mistake to reject it, because it does prescribe the formation of one efficient authority covering the entire country in its operations, and thus reduces to order and system the present chaos of conflicting institutions and agencies. That is in itself an enormous gain. The Government should be encouraged at once to proceed with and develop the measure on a large and generous scale. If competently worked, as I believe it will be, by the Municipal Councils, the interests of secondary education will be successfully promoted, and after some years' experience they may include elementary teaching in their operations. Thus, a uniform system being established, with clericalism and sectarianism reduced to a minimum, we may hope to see a scheme of truly national education by which the poorest child, through a regular and graduated course of instruction, may ascend from the elementary to the grammar and technical school and the college, to the advantages and distinction of a university career.

IMPRESSIONS OF WHIT-WEEK.

VIII.

To give an impression of the great international meetings is one of the hardest tasks I have ever encountered. It is true that I went up to London with high anticipations; it is also true that I returned with those anticipations more than realised. The meetings were a brilliant surprise in many respects.

1. They were a surprise to me in point of number. We often hear the accusation brought against us that as Unitarians we are lost in our individualism, and are incapable of collective demonstration. No doubt this has been in a large measure true in the past. We cut our various county and district societies up into so many islands, and hold communication but seldom with one another. This has had the tendency of developing characteristics which are not fundamental, but belong to our different districts or counties. So it becomes more and more difficult for us to unite with others, and form one body. I am now inclined to think that this unity has, in a measure, been brought about by the great meetings, and that in a manner it was never conceived of before. We had grown accustomed to small gatherings, and although we were determined to carry forward the flag whatever the peril might be, still the very smallness of our county army, fighting as it was against such heavy odds, had the tendency to crush within us the forward attitude. These meetings have shown that we belong to a mighty army—mighty in numbers as well as in strength. A view we have also received of the truth that this army is destined by the very nature of things to increase, for on all hands the spirit of the times, in a religious sense, is on our side. The Unitarian minister may now proclaim that his "cause" is known from Iceland to Japan. We had heard before that we were numerous in other churches, but now it has been revealed that we are more numerous in our own body than we had ever dreamed. Perhaps it is a weakness of mine, but I confess it—I possess greater inspiration than ever for the cause of liberal religion. I saw during the meetings that traditional theology has a mighty force to contend against in the beginning of this twentieth century. The fact that we are so numerous will encourage many ministers in hours of disappointment, and will be the means of reviving their spirits.

2. The meetings impressed me greatly by their unity of spirit. Representatives of fifteen different nationalities meeting and discussing theological matters for a whole week without one word of discord! Many things less extraordinary were recorded miracles in the past. The note of unity was sounded in all the meetings, and more especially did it sound in the noble sermon of Dr. Stopford Brooke. Beneath our various dressings of religion lies the deepest part of our being—the spirit which is greater than any words it can utter. Let us by all means dress our religion in the best possible manner, but do not let us forget the spirit for the body. The meetings taught us the need of a new comparative valuation of things. Perhaps it was a lesson we needed. Those who attended the meetings will need it no more. We shall lay no less an emphasis on the things of the head, but we shall lay more on the things of the heart. We shall now see that it is as important for us to feel as it is for us to think, for the meetings seemed to convey the great lesson that the deepest feelings and the noblest actions are the goal of thought. Many of us, I am sure, will view things in a deeper manner than before. The three devotional services, as well as the devotional part of the service at St. James's Hall, showed that our ministers are fully aware of the necessity of satisfying the needs of our spiritual nature.

3. The meetings gave abundant evidence that we are gradually focussing our energies towards a centre. The world of religion is a circumference as well as a centre, and the Unitarian body in the past has had, in a large measure, to make this discovery. The discovery has now been made, and who will blame the self-sacrificing Unitarian if, in order to know the nature of the circumference, he should forget at times the necessity of allowing that there should be one centre. We now agree that that centre is Jesus Christ and his spirit. These point the way to something beyond themselves — to God. Throughout the meetings I felt this note dominant; and how fortunate we are that this can be done without any theories about the person of Jesus. The vast number of subjects treated by the foreign delegates showed us that much remains still in the realm of the circumference to be explored. We cannot afford to neglect this duty either,

4. The meetings are a proof that a bright future awaits our cause if we can carry our spiritual life on as high a level as we carry our thoughts. Many of the addresses burned with a message. It was a kind of refined gold which thought and conviction had filtered into the depth of the heart. If such a message be ours, it will be bound to tell upon our people for lasting good, and also be the means of bringing others who cannot elsewhere find a rest to hear and to receive a gospel which can be warm without being superstitious, and which can satisfy the whole nature of man. I can never feel too grateful for the inspiration received at the great International Meetings of 1901.

Swansea. W. TUDOR JONES.

IX.

ON the eve of the recent meetings I was permitted to play something like the part of the herald; at your kind suggestion, Sir, I willingly add my voice to the recessional chorus, before it dies into the silence of happy memories and hidden resolves. not that there is need of further testimony to the unique interest of this event in our history. All I could say in appreciation of the weighty and eloquent utterances of Whit-week has been well expressed by other correspondents. If I were to speak of particular impressions it would be largely to corroborate the verdicts already returned. There is but one feeling prominent in my recollection, which I think has not been specially referred to in these communications, and I daresay, nevertheless, that many shared it with me. It was the feeling of the "unknown" element about us; faces unfamiliar, or altogether new, were abundant. There were, of course, the foreign visitors now so well-known to us and in the roll of friends. There were, also, the scores of young folk who were making, I must suppose, their "first appearances" at these anniversaries. And there seemed to be many of older years who also were "up" for the first time. In the absence of some, without whom it seems hard to realise ourselves the same people, here were the visible reminders that our inheritance is wide, and our possibilities truly unbounded.

For the rest, it may be best to say as one of the least of the "workers," that the prevailing mood with me was one of entire thankfulness. So much hard work had been put into this matter during months of preparation, so much steady thinking, and planning, and arranging had been done, that it would have been little short of tragic if the thing had proved a failure. But the numbers came up to the utmost anticipation, and the friends were so cordial and cheery—even when a "jam" occurred—and the notes of each meeting and service rang out so clear and true, that they who had worked hardest towards such results must have the completest satisfaction when they came about. My share, I repeat, was the most modest in this work; it may therefore be allowed me to glory on their behalf who would be the last to claim what is their due of praise.

But to have such workers, and such guests, and to hear such words and share such emotions—what is all this but God's blessing upon our churches, and schools, and families, and upon our whole movement? We will no more let our good be evil-spoken-of; least of all will we speak ill of it ourselves. "The Lord hath done great things for us," said the old Psalmist. If we can truly say that, we may go on our way rejoicing. I think that the afterglow of worship on Zion shone still in the eyes of the companies who went down to their homes again—in Nazareth or elsewhere; and the light in the eyes helped them to see light in the dim world of their cares and troubles. In days to come our returned pilgrims will assuredly have new light from this real "holy week" upon their paths of daily duty. And so may every festival help us—though such a festival, take it for all in all, we may not soon, or many of us ever, see again.

W. G. TARRANT.

INTERNATIONAL UNITARIAN LITERATURE.

IN an interesting letter addressed to the Committee of the International Council, the Rev. J. T. Sunderland, now of Toronto, has made a number of helpful suggestions. The following passages dealing with the question of the translation and publication of books and pamphlets into various languages will be read with interest:—

An important matter to be considered seems to me that of international literature, and the translation of Unitarian books and tracts into new languages, especially Spanish, Russian, Arabic, and Chinese.

As to Spanish, I may only say that many demands are coming to us in America for Unitarian literature in Spanish for use in Cuba, the Philippines, South America, Mexico, and even Spain. But as this is mainly an American affair, and as the American Unitarian Association is already doing a little in this direction, perhaps the International Council need not consider it, at least for the present.

As to the Russian, others can speak better than I. I will only call attention to the size and importance of Russia, her certainly great influence in the future, and the seeming opportuneness of the present time, when the national mind is so much in ferment, for the introduction of our ideas.

As to the Chinese, we all remember well the earnest pleas made both in England and America by our lamented Rev. Huberty James, for us to take steps to give our thought to the thousands of educated minds in China which are ready for it and can be helped by it as by no other religious thought. Urgent word is coming from many other sources confirming the testimony of Mr. James.

As to Unitarian literature in Arabic, this is of course for the use of Mahomedans. Mahomedans are Unitarian. Throughout all the leading Mahomedan nations there is a slowly rising tide of new life, new desire to break away from the stagnation of the past, new desire to get into touch with the larger knowledge and thought of Europe and America. This is true in religion as well as in other things. But Christianity in its Trinitarian forms Mahomedans will have nothing to do with. Toward Unitarianism, on the other hand, they have a friendly feeling. This I discovered in India; I also found evidences of the same in Egypt and Palestine. In Jerusalem I had an interview with Père Hyacinthe, who had been spending a year or two in Algiers, Tunis, Egypt, Turkey, and Syria, holding religious conferences among leading Mahomedans of many cities. He said what impressed him everywhere was the great mission that Unitarian Christianity had, if we only knew it, to these peoples. Their minds were ready for our gospel. They would listen to Christianity in no other form, but our thought they would welcome. Over and over he said, Why do you not send them missionaries? Why do you not give them your literature? Above all he urged that Channing should be translated and circulated among them, as the one prophet of the modern world who would have most power, as he believed, to reach and bless Mahomedan peoples. Such a testimony as this from Père Hyacinthe is not to be lightly esteemed.

This subject of the translation of our literature into new languages is a large one. I merely throw out these brief hints. It seems to me it is a matter which the Council may well consider.

AUCKLAND, NEW ZEALAND.

IT was February 26 of last year when I landed in New Zealand, with a three years' commission from the B. and F.U.A. to test the possibilities of a struggling young Unitarian movement in Auckland. To-day I venture to write home to the people of our churches with an appeal for help in erecting a place of worship, which will be, so far as I can learn, the first building in the colony dedicated solely to the practices of the Unitarian faith.

I found on my arrival a score or more of thoroughly earnest men and women, who had been encouraged to persevere by visits from the Rev. G. Walters, of Sydney, and R. H. Lambley, of Melbourne, and who held a weekly service in a hall. They had nobly prepared for the minister's coming, and from the first the work went with a swing. On the first Sunday evening there was a congregation of sixty-five, and from that day to this the numbers have never fallen away, but have kept on steadily increasing. After nine months it was deemed advisable to remove to a larger hall, and at present we have an assembly of between 100 and 150, most of whom are regular attenders. We have a Sunday-school of about twenty, also steadily increasing, and we hold monthly socials in the winter which attract between 150 and 200 people. The subscribers have risen in a year from thirty to sixty, and we have a clear balance-sheet, with a few pounds on the right side, aided by £75 from the B. and F.U.A. towards the minister's salary. I venture to consider it a record of fourteen months' work which many a long-established church in England would take some credit for. I submit that here is a sphere of work eminently worthy of home support, and that if it be but liberally supported now it will quickly be in no need of outside assistance. Here is a healthy seed which, with a little watering, may spread over the colony soon, as the English clover and other imported plants have propagated themselves, to the supplanting of native growths.

Auckland is the largest centre of population, and a fast growing city. The present census shows an increase of 10,000 in five years, bringing its numbers up to 60,000. It is the market centre for a wide and promising district, and a frequent place of call for the other towns of the colony, so that a church fixed here stands a good chance of "giving its light to all in the house."

The difficulties of building up a religious association in hired halls are too well known everywhere to need enlarging upon; but when the choice of halls is practically limited to a somewhat unsavoury locality, and the general demand so great as to confine the church's use to its Sunday meetings, those difficulties are enormously enhanced.

Knowing that we can have no chance of permanency until we are masters of our own meeting-place, we have raised £260 for a building fund. We have secured a leasehold site at a moderate rental, and have the plans of a pretty little church ready, the design of a member of our own congregation.

The stand is a most favourable one, at the junction of four important roads, and in the centre of the most densely-populated and most rapidly progressing district of the city.

The little church when complete will seat 400, and be so furnished as to enable it to be used for all purposes.

The estimated cost is £800, towards which we have the £260 already mentioned, which we hope to raise to £300 among ourselves, in addition to which we have the promise of a loan of £200 at moderate interest from one of our supporters; and it is the remaining £300 that we confidently look to our friends and kinsmen of the homeland to contribute.

We are not a wealthy band. Incomes are very level here, and though that level, for all except intellectual labour, is higher on an average than in England, yet expenses are higher also as a general rule. We have given as much as we can. Without this help from home we should still build, I make no doubt, but it would take time, and time is of great importance with us. Our own enthusiasm is warm, the public interest is awakened, and if the matter be not pushed at the present high tide, the consequences may be serious.

Here are your kinsmen, and even members of your own families, cast adrift among all the dangers of a new country. Let a little of the private sympathy which you extend to them be deflected to the establishment of a church where they may find a religious home, and some of the sanctions of morality to which they have been accustomed in their early years.

Here are thousands of people brought up in orthodox faiths, upon whose minds the new surroundings and influences have had a disintegrating effect. Help them to a rational resting place. There are men and women, now most regular attendants with us, who have never entered a place of worship for ten, twenty, even thirty years.

Here is a missionary enterprise to your own people. Here is a small opportunity of tightening the bonds of affection and gratitude, of community of faith and of race, which unite the colony to the beloved motherland. WILLIAM JELLIE.

CORRESPONDENCE.

[The Editor is not responsible for the opinions expressed by correspondents. LETTERS CANNOT BE INSERTED WITHOUT THE WRITER'S NAME; and all private information should be accompanied by the name and address of the sender.]

THE NAIL ON THE HEAD.

SIR,—Permit me to bear my humble testimony to the great importance of Mr. Armstrong's address on "Religious Thought in England at the Close of the Nineteenth Century," reported in your issue of June 22. He has raised out of the dust of obscure controversies the one issue of vital significance, distinguishing for ever the question of Religion itself from all those belonging to Philosophies of Religion. Is communion of the human spirit with the Divine Spirit a reality or a dream? Is the "Beatific Vision" the supreme experience of mortal life, or is it only the beautiful illusion of exalted souls? On the reply "Yes" or "No" to these questions depends the supreme interest of religion.

No material symbol conceivable—not the relation of Parent to Child, or of the Sun in heaven to the planets which circle around it and draw life and warmth from its beams—can possibly afford us any adequate or fitting simile of the relation of the Infinite Spirit to the finite spirits which live and move and have their being in Him. This being so, it would seem little short of profane audacity to attempt to draw definitions concerning the awful phenomenon of spiritual contact between God and the human soul. We cannot worthily speak, we can hardly think of it in a merely critical and scientific-theological way. But each of us may surely decide the question of fact, whether such Divine Communion remains to us as a supremely true experience, the never-to-be-forgotten revelation in the soul that God is Good, in the sense in which we in our own hearts account and love goodness.

The real marvel, surely, is, not that God is sometimes near us, sometimes in touch with our souls, but that (so far as our consciousness goes) there is commonly so great a gulf between our souls and Him! As the lark in the blue heaven, as the fish in the wave, as the planet swimming in the boundless ether, our finite spirits are surrounded and interpenetrated by the Infinite Spirit. What wonder is it if a few times in our short human life, after long yearnings or faithful obedience, we are granted the privileges of sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty, and permitted to become conscious that He is near us?

All such experience may be only a dream. But there is as much reason to hold that human love also is only a dream and a delusion. The love which has looked out on us from the eyes of mother or friend and met ours in ineffable sympathy in the sweetest moments of earthly blessedness, may also have been only a dream! Each of us may be alone and unloved by any being in the universe, human or divine. We cannot prove Love, scientifically. But if we have implicit faith (as what generous heart has not?) in the love of the human friend—conveyed to us so nearly in the same way as the Divine one, without voice or touch by the magnetism of spirit to spirit—we ought not surely to find it very difficult to trust that we were not dreaming when we seemed to know by direct revelation that God exists, and is our eternal Friend.

It is a strange circumstance (Mr. Armstrong has not failed to observe it) that when liberal theologians begin to diverge from the grand old simple doctrine, "Hear, O Israel! The Lord our God is ONE Lord," and to pursue metaphysical speculations on the nature of the Deity, they always first approach Ditheism viâ Christolatry, abstaining from any reference to the Third Person in the orthodox Christian Trinity. To me it appears that the converse process would be more logical and bring us nearer to the truth. As our real knowledge of God—if the foregoing remarks be true—is derived from personal spiritual experience, it would surely be most fitting to begin our theological credo with the article:

"I BELIEVE IN GOD THE HOLY GHOST;" and thence cautiously advance, so far as our philosophy may warrant, in identifying that Holy Spirit, as revealed in the innermost sanctuary of our souls and consciences, with the tremendous "Power behind Nature" revealed by science; the "Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth." Let us not begin with Nature, with her riddles of death and evil—agonising to our conscience, and almost driving us to despair—nor yet with the lovely human Character which has for nineteen centuries illumined the world, but whose true features, as the microscope of criticism is directed to his portrait, each in turn becomes obscure. Let us begin with the "Holy Spirit throned within us,"* the Teacher to each of us, and in our own hearts, of Justice and Mercy, Truth and Love; He to whom we cannot pray while we cherish any sin. On that grand, and for ever moral, foundation, let us build our theology.

"A NEW NOTE IN UNITARIANISM."

SIR,—The Christian World of June 13 publishes under this heading a letter from some Unitarian correspondent, which is extremely interesting and deserves that an answering chord should make itself heard on our side. I say "our side" because I belong to Congregationalism, and it has often seemed to me a matter of deepest regret that such noble fellow-soldiers in the great warfare against the world's evil, as so many Unitarians undoubtedly are, should not have warmer recognition of comradeship among us who are designated the orthodox. Our friend's letter to the Christian World goes far to explain the reason. He says: "The conception of Jesus merely as an ethical and spiritual teacher has been the prevalent one among Unitarians for nearly forty years." If so, we can hardly wonder at the estrangement; for between that conception and the orthodox view the gulf is very great indeed, and one sees not how it can by any possibility be filled up.

But if the "Religion of the Incarnation" as set forth with such ability just now in the pages of THE INQUIRER, and alluded to by the said correspondent, is really getting hold of the modern Unitarian mind, there seems to be much more hope of a better understanding and realisation of brotherhood. For I think there must be very many in the orthodox churches—I personally know a few—who do not and cannot believe that Trinitarianism is the last word. They march under the banner of orthodoxy, but decline to swear by every line and letter of the device inscribed upon it—that fearful and wonderful legend of Nicene dogma which was never dreamed of in the theology of Paul, nor hinted at in the teachings of the Synoptic Gospels. If we are scornfully told that we must be one or the other—if not Trinitarians, then Unitarians—we reply, logically, perhaps, yes; but practically, no. That cast-iron alternative can be left out of sight at present; we can wait for fuller light. We may be permitted to take the attitude of the clear-thinking and accomplished expounder of the Ritschlian Theology—Garvey—who in a foot-note says that for himself, while "confessing God as Father, Son, and Spirit, and Jesus as Son of God and Son of Man," he holds "that the doctrines of the Godhead and Christ need a theological restatement in which our modern conceptions of 'personality,' 'development,' 'liberty,' will gain full recognition, and the less adequate ancient conceptions of 'nature,' 'substance,' 'person' will be superseded."

Meanwhile we of the orthodox side and the Unitarians, or at least those of them who emit the "new note," can gladly agree in insisting upon the view of Jesus as more than "a mere ethical and spiritual teacher," as, in fact, quite unique and transcendent among men, being what Martineau so strongly held—the very personation of God, the type and "human image of the Everlasting Mind." Or, as Stopford Brooke puts it, "God may be more than personal, but He is personal to us in Jesus."

If leading Unitarians hold such views, and if, on the other hand, many of us who belong to the other churches have come to regard the Nicene theology as something of an ancient fraud, it ought surely to be possible for such brethren of both parties to dwell together in more of unity, and perhaps to combine more successfully in a nobler and wiser propaganda than the world has ever seen. * "Sacer inter nos Spiritus sedet, bonorum malorumque observator et custos."—SENECA.

WE are glad to see from a note in the Athenæum that Professor T. W. Rhys Davids is to contribute a volume on "Buddhist India" to Mr. Fisher Unwin's "Story of the Nations" series. Readers who have long been familiar with Mr. Rhys David's masterly little book on Buddhism in the series on "Non-Christian Religions," published by the R.T.S., and know of his distinguished services as editor of ancient Buddhist literature, will look with the greatest interest for this new book, which, beginning with the seventh century B.C., is to deal, among other things, with the social condition, the literature, the political and religious history of India.

OBITUARY.

GEORGE HOLDEN.

THE following notice appears in Old and New, a journal of Liberal Religion, Davenport, Iowa, Feb., 1901 :—

"In the death of George Holden, Jan. 16, the town and country-side of Manly loses one of its best citizens, and the Unitarian cause one of its most devoted friends. He was born in Shipley, Yorkshire, England, Jan. 29, 1833, and came to America, April 9, 1872. He was a man of strictly temperate habits, thoroughly industrious, and in all dealings honourable and trustworthy. By hard labour upon the part of himself and family a fine large farm remains as the outward fruit of his labours. But, though thrifty and ambitious, as all should be in their outward ways, he was never heedless of the high possessions of character. Though born and reared in an orthodox family, he became interested in the Unitarian church at an early age, and displayed his interest by a lifetime of devotion that was as effective as it was rare. Taking one child upon his shoulder while the other was led by the mother, he and his wife would start off for the Unitarian Church in Lydgate, England, to be ready for the four services on Sunday, which were then held—Sunday-school at 9 o'clock, church at 10.30 o'clock, Sunday-school again at 2 o'clock, and church at 3 o'clock in the afternoon, and return home at night 'tired but happy.' He not only taught in the Sunday-school, but also conducted services as a lay-preacher. When he removed to America the spirit of religious service was still strong upon him, and when he found it impracticable to give that service effectively through orthodox churches, he united with the devoted little band of women and men in and about Manly to secure the little church building at Manly, and to carry on the church and Sunday-school there. The efficiency of his ministry is attested by more than one person who received more light and leading from his word and influence than from any other speaker.

"The efficiency of his ministry as a man and neighbour was eloquently attested by a large assembly of people who, on a bitterly cold day, were present at his funeral, and by the sincere words of affection which were spoken on all sides. The little church being too small to hold all who wished to be present at the services, which were conducted by the Rev. Arthur M. Judy, they were held in the Oddfellows' Hall, which had been kindly offered for the occasion. Mr. Holden was a fine representative of the flowering of the English middle-classes, and a fine type of a well-rounded man. He was successful as a business man, yet a lover of good books and a constant reader. He was tender and true, rearing a large family in the best habits of industry and culture, yet he found time to care for the interests of Church and State. And about him, his faithful and steady friends, was centred a fine group of his fellow-countrymen. When such men and women contribute to the foundation of a new State we may be of good courage for its future. Upon their children and their children's children they lay a splendid burden—the burden of carrying on their good works, and living up to their example. May it be so in and about Manly, and there be found there for generations to come living monuments of these brave and true pioneers—sons and daughters worthy of such fathers and mothers—and may they keep the little church at Manly ever alive, to be for the future, as it has been for the present 'a little garden of Liberalism.'"

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A FORTNIGHT ago I told you the story of Flitter, the little dove, who was a peacemaker among the fowls with whom she lived, and I asked whether you who read this column knew any good stories about gentleness and peacemaking which you would like to tell the others; but no one has sent me any stories yet. So I am going now to tell you one which may, perhaps, make some of you think of others for you to tell.

My story is about Oberlin, who was a native of Strasburg, and in the year 1767 went as a young man to be the minister in a rocky valley in Alsace, called the Steinthal, to the eastward of the Vosges Mountains, where the country was wild and bare, and the people were desperately poor. They were not only poor, but very ignorant, and many of the young men of the scattered villages grew up in idleness, and were very rude and violent, so that they made a great deal of trouble in the valley.

At first Oberlin was very angry with them, and preached fiercely against their evil ways, with threatenings of terrible punishments in store for them; but this seemed to make them, if anything, worse than before, and soon he saw that it was not by threatening and anger that he would move them to a better life, but by gentleness and the power of love. So he began to preach not the terrors of hell fire, as he had done at first, but the great love of God; and what touched the hearts of those rude and ignorant people even more than his beautiful preaching was the gentleness and unselfishness of his own life, which at last made them ashamed of their violence.

At one time, soon after he had learnt that better way of dealing with them, he heard that some of them had been threatening him with violence, and had said, "Our minister has too much fire; the next time he comes near us we will drag him through the nearest pond and cool his zeal."

When he heard that, he went to them and said: "My friends, I understand you have a desire to throw me into a pond. Now I perceive that you do not know my horse, if you imagine that it would be possible for you to overtake him. But I wish to tell you that in order to make it easier for you I shall leave my horse at home. In this way you are sure to succeed, for you know that I am not so fleet of foot as you."

So the next time he went from village to village visiting his people he went on foot, trusting himself to them, in spite of their threats; and his gentleness and good-nature made the violent ones ashamed of themselves, and no one did him any injury.

In the same way, when there had been a plot to way-lay him and flog him, he went to the ring-leaders, and told them he would rather deliver himself up into their hands than that they should be guilty of the meanness of lying in ambush; and that disarmed their evil purpose.

Oberlin was one of those who knew the meaning of the words, "Resist not evil," and conquered by gentleness and love. You can read more about him if you like, in the little book on "Twelve Hymns and their Writers," just published by our Sunday School Association. And if you have read Miss Cooke's "Story of John Greanleaf Whittier," also published by the Association, perhaps you remember what is told there in the first chapter of the first Whittier who settled in America, in the wild country where the Indians were, and how his peacefulness and trust won their confidence, and guarded him, as no arms or fighting could, from all danger of violence. Blessed are the peaceable and the peace-makers.

"A FRIEND AND UNITARIAN" writes to us from Birmingham with reference to the recent letter of Mr. H. B. Binns, which spoke of the lack he had felt at the International Council Meetings of periods of Devotional Silence, as follows:—"I who am in practice of attendance at the Meeting of Friends and those of Unitarians (the latter by preference, as I find the spoken words do mostly lead to what I consider the object of all Public Worship, the joining in a united act in which all help to give life and vitality to the worship) miss periods of silence. The worship is too full of words for all the words to have their full effect. I believe that if there were periods of silent worship it would deepen the effect on the hearts of the worshippers. The practice is not unknown in the Unitarian household of faith. At a memorial meeting of worship, at the Old Meeting Church, on the death of the Queen, there was a period of silence for united worship without words (so fitting in presence of death), which to my mind was good and helpful, quite as much as the spoken words."

A WIDE HORIZON.

THE gladness of spirit, the deep and quiet sense of a great and holy purpose moving in our life, appealing to us for utter loyalty and undaunted hope and courage, calling us to live as seeing the Invisible, and to rejoice in the strength of the Eternal and in the Love which is the fountain of our being and the end to which we are to attain—these which remain with us as the prevailing memories, and more than memories, the new gifts of abiding inspiration, from our national and international gatherings at Whitsuntide, found long ago prophetic utterance in that beautiful anniversary hymn of SAMUEL LONGFELLOW's which we quoted as a prelude to the meetings in our Whit-week number.

One in the freedom of the Truth,
  One in the joy of paths untrod,
One in the soul's perennial youth,
  One in the larger thought of God—

The freer step, the fuller breath,
  The wide horizon's grander view,
The sense of life that knows no death—
  The Life that maketh all things new!

And we still thankfully linger over the thoughts quickened within us to such vividness in that happy time, not eager for any final summing up of its results, knowing that we have received great gifts, and have an abundant store of the deep things of the Spirit to be long pondered in quietness, resting in the great central truths so brought home to us, that our life may be nourished in a new strength for more faithful and more fruitful service.

Above all other thoughts is the one deep conviction of the reality and the joy of our life with GOD, a joy deep and wonderful in spite of all the anguish that is not wanting in this present time. For this remains with us as the supreme truth, that we are folded in the care of the infinite and eternal Love, that we are here to do our FATHER's will, and that He is leading us and will give to the faithful and humble soul, knowing the secret of unselfish love, all the light it needs.

That great affirmation we have in Mr. ARMSTRONG's paper, published last week, and in the welcome letter from Miss FRANCES POWER COBBE, in our present issue, calling attention to the vital importance of Mr. ARMSTRONG's plea. On many sides the same conviction has found utterance, as in another letter which we published a fortnight ago from Mr. H. B. BINNS, of York, testifying to the reality of our communion with GOD, as FATHER.

In this one great thought we rest; but it must be to us a thought of living truth, the "master light of all our seeing," as was so forcibly declared in Mr. CARPENTER'S presidential Address to the International Council. And in this connection we beg of our readers the most earnest consideration of the Address given by Mr. JOHN DENDY as President of the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire, an address which was summarised in our report last week, and which will appear in full in our next issue. It makes an appeal which cannot be neglected, for the fuller realisation of the faith which has possessed our souls, and which demands of us a new wisdom and a new passion of self-devoted and loyal service, in view of the greater world and the new problems which have opened out to us in the present time.

As we enter more fully into that communion with the living GOD, our FATHER, and understand more completely what it implies and demands of us, we have indeed a wide horizon, a limitless vision of eternal, spiritual life, in which Love is supreme, and in which all the grace of CHRIST'S manhood in its inspiring and commanding force becomes clear to us, touching every humblest duty with divine significance, leaving no part of our life without the light of hope and the guidance that must overcome the evil, and bring it into harmony with the perfect thought of GOD.

In this faith, as Christians in the true spiritual sense, in a lowly, trustful spirit, as children of our FATHER in heaven, we must meet the earnest challenge of Mr. GRAHAM WALLAS'S address on "Religion and Empire," published in our present issue. The "world-ethic," as it appears to us, can only be truly established in the light of a Christian manhood, and we most thankfully recognise that same spirit in the Buddhist teachers of Japan, to whom Mr. WALLAS has alluded. What is best and highest in their teaching is to us an essential part of Christian ethics. Mr. WALLAS says that Christianity has been an exclusive religion. That has, unhappily, been and still is to a large extent the vice of its dogmatic theology, but in the heart of JESUS there was no such exclusiveness, and as his disciples we learn to think of all men as children of our common Father, and to enter with sympathy into lives most diverse from our own. If Christianity, understood as the religion of JESUS, and of those who have learnt the secret of his life, is rightly termed anthropocentric, it can no longer be in the sense that it urges each man to care only for the salvation of his own soul. Its care is for man, and the social ideal of the Kingdom of GOD on earth, as in heaven, has now a growing sway in the hearts of true disciples, while that care for man does not exclude tenderness and a veritable humanity in all relations with dumb creatures.

Thus we should affirm that the true Christian ethic is waiting, if men will but be faithful to the light which has dawned for them, to furnish that world-ethic which the present needs of mankind so urgently demand. But it can only prevail when life is taken with a new earnestness as from the living GOD, quickened by His constant presence, when faithful men are given up to speak His word, and to suffer the uttermost, even as JESUS died for the sake of his fellow-men. There is no easy path of salvation, but there is the great joy of divine life offered to us, asking the surrender of our souls, the humble and steadfast service of a faithful and unselfish manhood.

MORNING MUSIC.

ROSES, in rosebuds sleeping unborn,
Wake into beauty, welcome the morn!
Daylight is dawning, shadows depart,—
Sunshine celestial, come to my heart!

Waving grass tipt with diamond dew,
Clouds silver-white on tenderest blue,
Glory below and glory above
Call me to wonder, worship, and love.

Children of sunshine, flowers of the field,
Tribute of incense gratefully yield;
Song, in the wild-bird's bosom upstored,
Pour from the sky in praise of the Lord!

Thou too, my spirit, silent so long,
Break forth at last in rapturous song,—
Music of morning, innocent bright,
Sweet as the rose, and pure as the light.

Voices immortal, host of the sky,
Sons of the Morn that never shall die,
New alleluias blend with our lays,— Gleams of the perfect sunshine of praise.

RELIGION AND EMPIRE.

BY GRAHAM WALLAS, M.A.*

IN order to save time I shall begin not with elaborating arguments, but with laying down assumptions. I shall assume that the present movement of the world is towards the formation not of nations, but of empires; that the nations of European origin, which were consolidated from one hundred to fifty years ago, are now gathering round them bodies of dependent peoples, in many cases greatly out-numbering themselves, but without either political rights or the prospect of assimilation by intermarriage. I shall assume that that process is separate from, though it is in a certain sense connected with, the tendency among the nations to quarrel among themselves about the control of the subject races. For instance, in South Africa, the question of the relation of the white man and the black man is entirely different from the question as to who shall be the white man. Then I shall further assume that this process is no longer due to the unauthorised acts of individual explorers or missionaries—into the results of whose work the nation at home used somewhat unwillingly to enter—but that since the first partition of Africa, sixteen years ago, it is the result of the deliberate action of the Great Powers and of their responsible Governments. I shall finally assume that the cause which has brought this about, and which is every day accelerating the process, is the enormous improvement in the means of communication on the surface of the globe, and that we are to expect that this process will develop on its economic side until the world is organised economically as one place, that is to say until the production and distribution of goods on the earth is carried on by one system, though under various forms of Imperial control.

Now this process has within the last few months given rise in Germany to a word which I believe will be used all over the world before very long—I mean the word "world-politics." And my purpose in speaking to-day is to ask you whether there exists at this moment a "world-ethic," a moral conception of world relations, corresponding to the new world politics. I think it is almost impossible to answer "yes" to that question. If I asked the English men and women in this room, and still more, perhaps, if I asked the Germans, the Icelanders, the Dutch, the Hindoos, the French in this room—if I asked them what is the moral relationship between the weaker races in the great empires, and the stronger races—not what their relation is, but what it ought to be, I should receive a curiously inconsistent series of connected answers. We English might all admit that the relation between ourselves and the Australian blacks should be different from our relation with the Kaffirs in Africa; and further, we might wonder whether we have any right founded upon superior civilisation, or upon anything else, for the existence of our Indian Empire; but we should agree on no positive and general conception.

Now, if I had been speaking in this room to an audience drawn from the same sources fifty or sixty years ago, I should have then expected to find such an agreement on a positive and general principle. We should have been living just at the most triumphant moment of that great Christian and humanitarian movement which first destroyed the slave trade, and then, having abolished slavery throughout the British Empire, by a still more heroic effort abolished it in the States of North America; and which finally enfranchised the American negroes, and made them equal citizens with their late masters. That movement was not confined to the Churches. It is one of the very few instances where an agitation, originating in a few despised and extreme religious men, succeeded in guiding the policy of at least two great nations throughout a whole generation.

And if you were to ask me what was the last occasion on which the British Parliament laid down any principle whatsoever as to the relation between the stronger and weaker races in the British Empire, I should have to go back to the year which followed the abolition of slavery, to the resolution passed by the House of Commons in 1834. In that year the House of Commons unanimously resolved:—

> That His Majesty's Commons are deeply impressed with the duty of affording to the native inhabitants of the colonial settlements protection in the enjoyment of their civil rights, and of imparting to them that degree of civilisation and that religion with which Providence has blessed this nation.

As the result of that resolution a Committee was formed, and the chairmanship was taken by Sir Fowell Buxton, a member of that family that has done so much for the great cause of humanity all over the world, who had with him Sir George Grey, the Colonial Secretary, and a rising young politician, Mr. William Ewart Gladstone. The Committee sat for two sessions, taking evidence largely from missionaries, and presented a report, in which they said:—

> We are at least bound to do to the inhabitants of other lands, whether enlightened or not, as we should in similar circumstances desire to be done by.

And they laid down that "the native inhabitants of any land have an incontrovertible right to their own soil."

Now throughout the arguments of that Committee, and the evidence of their witnesses, there runs the biological assumption, that within a very short period of time members of all the races in the world may be treated as being intellectually and morally, if not physically, identical. It was constantly stated that a very few years of education, following upon conversion, would make the ordinary inhabitants, say, of a South Australian village, for all spiritual, intellectual, and political purposes, identical with the inhabitants of an English village. And I remember that an Archdeacon who came from Australia and who had had in his house some six or seven boys from one of the most degraded of the Australian tribes, declared that after three or four years they could repeat the Creed and the Catechism of the English Church with as much intelligence as the ordinary English boy in his church school at home.

That assumption, on which rested so much of the great humanitarian movements of the last century, and which was shared not only by the Christian thinkers of the time, but by many opponents of Christianity, by such a friend of education, for instance, as James Mill, is now absolutely dead. What has killed it? In the first place the patient study of men of science. Since Darwin re-vivified biology we have come to see that even if we call the differences between the various races of human beings "varieties" instead of "species" we do not make them any the less permanent. That is to say that speaking of the generations, the centuries, the thousands, if you like, of years with which politicians deal, it must be taken that those distinctions are actually permanent, and that however easy it may be to say, in the words of the resolution of 1834, that it is our duty to impart to all the inhabitants of the globe that degree of civilisation to which we have attained, the question whether it is possible to do so depends upon the scientific conditions of the problem, and not upon any vote of the House of Commons. In the next place, not only have the conclusions of scientific men gradually filtered down to the non-scientific readers of the newspaper, but the improvement of the means of communication of which I have spoken has brought each one of us infinitely nearer to actual contact with the varieties of the human race in the world than our ancestors ever could have been. Not only are we familiar from our childhood with photographs of all these races, not only do members of each race walk our streets daily, but there exists a school of vivid writers who have set themselves to bring the feelings of those who have lived among weaker races home to those who stay in England. Every one of us feels a certain superiority over the ideas of "Paget, M.P.," or of any other member of Parliament who has made a six weeks' tour to see India or Africa, even if we have made no tour at all. Besides, there have to be added those causes—full, I believe, of immense good in the future, but, in part, destructive for the present—which have undermined the old basis of Protestant Christianity.

The effect of all this is that the conception which used to be sneered at by its enemies as the "man and a brother" idea, instead of directing the policy of England and America, as it did, for instance, when it forced England to wait till the last moment before annexing New Zealand, for fear that we might injure the Maories, has now absolutely disappeared from English politics; and that in America we have seen, with hardly a word of protest, those clauses in the Constitution which enfranchised the negro and made all dependent territory a part of the United States frustrated. We see also that in England the use of the word "rights," in our dealings with weaker races, has gone, and that the King in his speech this year made a pointed difference between the "equal rights" that we were told must be given to white people, and that "protection and justice" which we must afford to the native population.

The old theory has gone, and no theory, no ethical conception whatsoever of the problem has taken its place; not even a working rule for dealing in the same way with populations of the same kind. It is a matter of accident within the British Empire how a population of a given grade of intelligence shall be treated. In the Soudan, for instance, we treat black tribes according to traditions derived from India—traditions which prevent those who govern from getting for themselves the coarser forms of personal profit. Those traditions have been elaborated first by the genius of Burke, and then by the example of many of the heroes of Anglo-Indian statesmanship. In India and in the Soudan, whether arrogantly or not, whether sympathetically or not, whether wisely or not, at any rate the native people are governed for their own sakes by men who are not permitted to own a single acre of land, or a single share in a company, and are governed largely in accordance with native ideas. Go south from the Soudan and you come to British East Africa, where again, I am thankful to say, the British East Africa Company has become bankrupt, and the Home Government with its Indian traditions has entered into possession. But sail down one long lake from the south of British East Africa, and you will arrive at the northernmost extension of South Africa. There, no native is allowed, in practice, to own a yard of land. The government is carried on by men whose first qualification is that they are shareholders in a trading company. Almost all government is carried on indeed throughout South Africa, whether English or Portuguese or Dutch, for the white man, and according to his own ideas and for his own profit only. Now such an accidental collocation of completely different methods and ideas within one Empire cannot permanently exist. Sooner or later we shall have to face the alternative which the States of North America faced in the sixties, that either the federation which binds us together must be broken, or the local rights, which we call "self-government," must cease in those countries where the huge majority are enslaved. It will be impossible for two diametrically opposite ethical conceptions to live in one State.

Nothing, again, could be more pitiful, and nothing, in a sense, could be more salutary than the ludicrous helplessness of the great Christian Powers who are now encamped inside and outside Peking. Ask them why they are there, and what they are going to do, and what good thing is going to come from it all—the Germans stand there helpless, while the Social Democrats mock them, and the Americans, while Mark Twain makes them a hissing and a scorn. It is easy for men to speak of themselves as practical politicians, and to despise philosophy and ethics and religion as unpractical, but the present state of things in China is the clearest possible proof that the civilised world cannot possibly exist without ethical conceptions. As it is, the intellect of the statesmen who are engaged in the Chinese affair is only capable of a feeble imitation of that saying of Bismarck's—which sounded so wise, and was so shallow—that he himself, in international matters, cared only for national interests—a phrase that Mr. Chamberlain has made his own. To see the representatives of the Great Powers sitting round a table and saying one after another, "I only care for the interests of my country," is to receive a living proof that we are at the beginning and not at the end of the problem.

But it is not enough to say we have no world-ethic now. We must also ask what chance there is of such an ethical conception coming to us and being accepted by the nations who for the moment are responsible for the Imperial organisation of our globe—a conception that men shall not only believe, but also obey. In asking this, we must satisfy ourselves by no easy optimism. Even from our own selfish point of view we must remember that the attempt to solve the Imperial problem on the basis of national selfishness may lead to a universal welter of Imperial wars, and that is too serious a matter to be smoothed over.

Can Christianity give us the light we need? The Christian religion in its hundred forms has one advantage, that it is in possession of those races who, for the moment, have to do the thinking for the world-movement. Not only is it in possession at home, but there is a great army of Christian missionaries abroad, living in the presence of the non-white races, and, one hopes, trying to bring the Christian religion into touch with the actual problems as they see them. And Christianity in the past has shown itself capable of adaptation to new problems which were not in the minds of its original founders.

But if I had to answer the question myself, I am afraid that I do not—trying to look coldly and impartially at the conditions of the problem—expect that from Christianity there will come a world-ethic which will be obeyed. It seems to me that some of the vital principles of Christianity, the surrender of which means the destruction of Christianity itself, make it more difficult for a man brought up in the atmosphere of the Christian religion than for one brought up in the atmosphere of at least one other religion to see the problem as it is, and to face it under its own conditions. Christianity is above all things, in its history and in its origin, an anthropocentric religion—a religion centred upon the individual soul of man. The vast majority of Christians believe that the individual soul, whether of the West Australian black, or the negro, or of a member of any race white or non-white, after a moment of life in this world attains to immortal equality. That conception, it seems to me, is extremely easy, if Christianity is a mere theological belief about another world, but it makes it extremely difficult for a Christian to enter into the actual conditions of a problem, of which the essential element is the permanence in this world of human variations. Again, although we have spoken of Christianity this morning as being a religion of tolerance, and as being one of many religions all of which have their share of truth, Christianity, in its origin and in its development, has declared itself to be the only true religion, and has been based not upon patient observation, but upon supernatural signs and wonders. I may be wrong, but I have not disguised my thought, because it is necessary in this problem that we should face all thoughts.

If I were asked whether there is any one of the great established religions from which it is possible that a conception of the world-problem could, in our time, come, I should look perhaps to Buddhism. Certainly, the only sane, kind and, as it seems to me, true argument concerning the Chinese question that has been issued by the officials of any State or Church, is that which has been issued by the Buddhists of Japan. And I will add that the only sane and kind and true thing done in all that welter of stupidity and cruelty was done by the Buddhists of Japan, when they refused to take any compensation for the destruction of their sacred buildings. It seems to me, again, that Buddhism has an advantage in that it is not anthropocentric, and does not treat the universe merely as a painted background before which is acted the tragedy of human life. A religion which looks on human life in its relation to a living universe presents some possibility of overcoming the apparently instinctive hatred that divides the white and black races of mankind. Certainly in this war in South Africa he would be most likely to think of the Kaffirs whose crops we are burning who also had a thought for the hundreds of thousands of oxen and of horses whom we are torturing to death.

In any case, let us hope that not only is the need of some world-ethical conception strong upon us, but that such a conception must come. A change in the conditions of human life so great as that which is involved in making the world one place, communication over which takes a second by the telegraph, and a few weeks by steam, cannot be effected without a far-reaching influence upon human imagination. As long as we could think of ourselves as being surrounded by unexplored tracts of land and ocean, the human spirit could treat war and hatred as local accidents, and plunge forward into the unknown without a sense of limitation. Now that we know the little ball on which we move as we know the streets of our native town, the possibility of our living for further generations like rats fighting each other in a narrow pit may be, one hopes, too dreadful for us to face. And not only must that sense of limitation come home to us, but we shall be tempted—nay, we shall be compelled—to look beyond our globe out into the great expanse of the heavens, and try to bring our human needs, our human passions into relation with the eternities of space and time.

A VERY pleasant memorial of the first meeting of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers may now be had in the form of a photographic group of a number of the delegates and some of the chief of the London hosts and workers, taken early on Thursday morning in Whitweek on the steps of St. Ermin's Hotel. The group includes thirty-three members, with the President of the Council in the centre, immediately surrounded by delegates from France, Italy, Holland, Switzerland and America. Belgium, Germany, Denmark and Hungary are also represented in the group. Two of our English workers, who arrived just too late to take their places in the group, have yet been introduced, as indispensable, by a process of magic, mysterious but most welcome. For so large a group the photograph is wonderfully successful. It is by Messrs. Elliott and Fry, 55, Baker-street, W., and may be had at Essex Hall. The price is 5s. for the ordinary photograph and 7s. 6d. in platinotype.

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.

THE annual proceedings at the close of the session took place at the College on Thursday and Friday, June 20 and 21. The morning and afternoon of Thursday were devoted to the reading of students' essays and answers to examination questions, and sermons were preached in the College Chapel by Mr. A. R. Andreae, B.A., and Mr. E. G. Evans, B.A., who have completed their college course. Mr. Andreae is to join the Rev. H. E. Dowson in the ministry at Gee Cross; Mr. Evans will enter on his ministry at Chesterfield.

THE VALEDICTORY SERVICE.

On Thursday evening the Valedictory service was held in the College Chapel. The first part of the service was conducted by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, and the farewell on behalf of the College to the two students, whose course is completed, was given by the Rev. Dr. Drummond, the Principal, while the welcome into the ministry was given by the Rev. L. P. Jacks.

DR. DRUMMOND, in the course of his address, spoke of that hour of parting as a time for earnest thought and humble consecration, that there might be no lack of faith and love in those who were committing themselves to a divine calling, that no personal ambitions and claims might mar the sincerity of their labours. Looking back upon their college days he spoke of the stimulus and the rich associations of university life, the stirring of buoyant life, the play and collision of thought, the contact with varieties of character, which taught more than the direct instruction of the class-room; and if at times the crowd repelled, there was the refuge of solitude always close at hand in that lovely country, where the peacefulness of Nature could sink into the heart and bring them nearer to the peace of God.

And then there was the appeal of history in the venerable colleges of that University, to which they could not be indifferent, speaking of high achievement, patient toil and religious consecration. There the mighty dead spoke in the softened tones of their ideal life. While they must not be lulled by the charm of the past, it was well to understand it, to sympathise with its modes and cultivate the deep and permanent aspects of human nature to which it so strongly appealed.

But their own College had also its traditions, which went back to the time when men butchered one another for the truth of God, when their fathers were driven out by the victorious faction, and held by the truth and the spirit of Christianity as something deeper than the changing forms of thought. Hence independence of thought and strength of character. That College represented a line of Academies, whose standard had been the highest University learning, with fealty to truth alone, and fellowship wide as the spirit of Christ, based on the freedom of the sons of God. Trained in that tradition, their students as preachers were free to follow the divine oracles of conscience and proclaim what after reverent search they believed to be religious truth; but having undertaken the duties of the ministry they were not free to neglect those duties for any other pursuit; they must not forget whose ambassadors they were, and must make the religious interests of their people their one concern. Freedom was not for their own will or their own glory, but that they might go direct to the sources of religious truth, and with lowly self-sacrifice gather heavenly treasure from the unsearchable riches of Christ.

In their life at Oxford the two lines of tradition so long sundered were mingled in confluent streams, and learning of both they could now feel that they belonged to a greater company and lose themselves in that eternal life abiding amid all the perishing forms which men's understanding had given it. Amid the play of ever enlarging life they might find that they were all one in the unity of brotherhood, which passed into the fulness of Christ. In conclusion, bidding Mr. Evans and Mr. Andreae, on behalf the College, an affectionate farewell, he recalled the great words that love is of God, and he that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God and God in him; and his prayer was that the Spirit of Christ might dwell in them more and more, and cause them to abound in the work of the Lord.

WELCOME INTO THE MINISTRY—THE PREACHER'S CALLING.

The Rev. L. P. JACKS, in giving the welcome into the ministry, spoke first of the need of conviction that the minister's calling was of God, and then proceeded as follows:—

Ours is the Liberal Faith, and to preach that is our mission. To preach it—and let me say I am sometimes inclined to think that since the days of Jesus Christ the Liberal Faith has not been preached in the world. Men have written about it; they have shown a mental grasp of it in philosophy, in literature and to some extent in art; but in the actual life of the churches it has always been mixed with something that is foreign to its essence. Various approximations to the Liberal Faith have been preached, are being preached; but the religion that is worthy of being called universal is waiting for its preacher. Till the preacher comes it will not be accepted of men.

The Liberal Faith is not a problem, nor a series of problems; but a message, which can be delivered in one way only, by the direct appeal of soul to soul—in other words, by preaching. Too long we have been in the habit of treating the Liberal Faith as though it were a problem, and, misled by that idea, we have not learned how to preach. We have expounded the problem, but not delivered the message. Exponents of the faith have been many, but messengers of the faith have been singularly few. My brothers, in the art of explaining yourselves to the world you may become accomplished masters, but in preaching you may remain "as infants that cannot speak." The two things have little relation to one another, and they have no resemblance at all. We have not grasped the difference between them; and in consequence we have often thought we were preaching, when in truth we were not preaching at all. Composing sermons and delivering them is not preaching. In fact we have done everything for the Liberal Faith except preach it; but until we preach it, the Liberal Faith will never win its way. Some will say to you, as the angel said to St. John, "Write." I venture to say, instead, "Preach." One genuine preacher will render more service to the Gospel of Christ than a thousand books. In regard to the essential conditions of our work, we are where we should be if printing had never been invented and there were no books in the world. God requires a living witness; it was so in the days of St. Paul, and is so now. We need a clearer conception than we have ever had before, and a loftier conception, of the importance of the preaching function as such, and its distinctness from all other functions; and we need to give ourselves up to working out that conception with heart and soul and mind.

God forbid that I should speak of the preacher's office as though it were a trade, or even a fine art. But there can be no offence in saying this, that for its own sake it deserves an assiduity as great as that which men bestow on trade, and is susceptible of a perfection as high as belongs to any art. And I would earnestly commend it to you, as you now enter on the ministry, that ministers in their preaching are apt to be content with a level of performance which is far too low in regard to the message they have to deliver. I think that we have not grasped, as we ought to have done, the difficult height of our work. Granted the preparations of the closet, and the prayer behind the shut door, we have assumed that all the rest would come of itself. Our college years at an end, we have entered on the work without any further thought of training or discipline. We have assumed that we were men who knew their business, and perhaps have been conscious of a little resentment if it was hinted to us that we had yet something to learn. The truth is that however well those college years have been spent, we are still, broadly speaking, the veriest beginners. Our goal as preachers lies a vast distance ahead. And I say boldly that we shall never reach the goal, if we think that mere lapse of time will bring us to it. We are as children who have learnt their notes; but the preacher whom men wait to hear is one who can play upon the deeper chords of life with a true and perfect touch. The world is listening for the great music of God's message, but we in those early years can only scrape upon the strings. The preacher who would move men must have that same mastery in his office which any of the great artists have had in theirs. You may answer that only the Spirit of God can give him this. I accept that; and I believe that only the Spirit of God can create a Raphael or a Mozart. But does that exempt Raphael from the necessity of learning to draw; or shorten by one hour the years of arduous labour by which the musician makes himself master of the keys. In any walk but that of the ministry such counsels would at once be treated as pure folly. Here it is considered wise and right that we should depend on inspiration. No doubt we should. But is the earnest pursuit of excellence in our calling a barrier to inspiration? Whom does God love best to inspire—the passive soul which lazily sits at the receipt of custom waiting for a great idea to turn up, or the strenuous soul which watches and seeks? Depend upon it, my brothers, that the continuous training of yourself, body, mind, and soul, for your great work will render you more and not less inspired. Do not be led away by the mere name of inspiration, but lay yourself open to the reality by the ardent pursuit of a great ideal of what a preacher should be. I doubt not that you have an inward consecration to your work. Let it be reflected in the ardour and enthusiasm with which you seek to become masters of every proper and lawful instrument of your calling. To you is entrusted for God's service the great function of public speech. Be not content until you have mastered the noble secret of bending spoken speech to the purposes of God. Learn to fill it with the music of your voice, the music of your thought, and the yet higher music of your love to God and your sympathy with man.

It is, then, as preachers that I welcome you into our company to-night. Other characters will belong to you, that of pastors certainly; that of public workers perhaps. How these are related to the chief character I pause not to ask; I will only say they can never take its place. A wealth of love and friendship is waiting for you among the people to whom you will minister; take advantage of it; put yourself in the way of it, you not only will enjoy the greatest privilege of your life, but in contact with the men and women to whom you minister lies a chief part of your training for the preacher's work. Remember ever that you are men who have ventured something for God; be not surprised, then, at difficulties and defeats; be courageous in face of both, and never permit yourselves to complain. I welcome you to the service of a cause which by its very nature is difficult, a cause which none but the patient and the bold can truly serve. Let me add, however, that its possibilities are unexhausted. Its glories have yet to be revealed; its triumphs yet to be won. Both wait, until the preacher comes, and they wait for nothing else. The world is not deaf, and the time is not unripe. Welcome, then, to this land of hidden promise: be you of the pioneers who cut the steep path to the city of God. May you be loved of men, and may you be blessed of God.

THE VISITOR'S ADDRESS: A RETROSPECT.

On Friday at noon the Visitor's Address to the students was given by the Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL.

At the close of the first session of Manchester College in the new century it was natural, Mr. Steinthal said, for one who had been a student in the College more than half-a-century ago to look back and think of the changes which had taken place during the hundred years which included the greater part of its history. Recalling the foundation of the College in February, 1786, as an academy that was to offer "a full and systematic course of education for Divines, and preparatory instruction for the other learned professions, as well as for civil and commercial life," he pointed out that from the first it was declared: "This institution will be open to young men of every religious denomination, from whom no test or confession of faith will be required." That principle had been consistently maintained, and the founders of the College had shown an enlightened perception of the need of higher education, not only for the professions, but for every calling in life. It was only in the newly-established University of Birmingham that commerce had been made the subject of collegiate study, but at the second meeting of the Committee of the Manchester Academy, Dr. Barnes, the Principal, and its theological tutor, was requested to deliver a course of lectures on the Progress, Present State, and Principles of Manufactures and Commerce, together with a general view of Commercial Law and Commutative Justice. Manchester was proud of the high aims with which the founder of the Owens College was animated, and in a circular referring to its jubilee in the present year, the claim was made that Owens was the first of the colleges outside the metropolis that had aimed to give University training; but sixty years earlier Manchester College had aimed at the same high ideal.

As to the undogmatic and catholic spirit consistently maintained by the College Mr. Steinthal quoted some characteristic statements of various date, of which the following passage from the annual address of the Committee in 1835 was one:—

> No countenance is given to bigotry and intolerance by example. No inquisition is attempted into the religious tenets of students, whether upon entrance or subsequently. All are welcomed who come with minds seriously disposed to undertake the duties of a Christian teacher, and the whole treasury of knowledge is freely thrown open to all. No system, no sentiment is unfairly imposed. The students do indeed enjoy the advantage of hearing the opinions of their teachers, as well as their more positive instructions; but opinions are presented as opinions, and where there are different views, the books in which they are respectively maintained are named and the pupil is left to form his own judgment.
> The principles of free inquiry are inculcated, the theory of the duty and the right is given in the course of instruction and the practice is constantly advised and encouraged, and those who have studied in this college will bear witness that these principles are not maintained in word alone. They will testify that within these walls there is everything to promote the formation of mental independence and candour, and that any individual will have himself alone to blame who shall depart hence otherwise than prepared most dearly to prize the rights of human nature in himself and carefully to respect them in others.

In the latter part of his address Mr. Steinthal quoted from the Monthly Repository reports of some of the early examinations of students, giving particulars of the thoroughness of the work, and some amusing instances of the subjects chosen for the students' orations. Stress was laid in the old days, as in the present, on the importance of good elocution. As to what may be done by diligent training to secure a clear enunciation, Mr. Steinthal gave the testimony of his own personal experience. It was not difficult to read a manuscript from which all the vowels were omitted, while with the consonants left out it was illegible. If they took care in speaking to make the consonants distinct, they might rely on being heard whatever happened to the vowels.

In conclusion he referred to the honoured names on the roll of students of the College, and among them Hibbert, Grundy, Thomas and Travers Madge, John Gooch Robberds, William Turner, James Yates, William and Thomas Hincks, John James Tayler, Mark and Robert Philips, John Relly and Charles Beard, Robert Brooke Aspland, James Martineau, William Gaskell, Russell and Philip Carpenter, to name only a few of those who had gone to their reward, whose names recalled varied achievements in different careers of usefulness and service to men. The students of the present time, no longer shut out from the University, had great advantages. His hope was that the new century would see them win a place for themselves on the list of Oxford honours; but even more fervently he prayed that from the class-rooms of the College would go forth spirits richer in true Christian faith and in ministerial graces than, with less material and intellectual advantages, inspired the hearts and souls of those whose memory he had recalled, and who made them thankful to be on the roll of their dear Alma Mater, Manchester College.

THE TRUSTEES' MEETING.

The annual summer meeting of Trustees was held on Friday afternoon in the library, Mr. WILLIAM COLFOX, president, in the chair.

The minutes of the annual meeting in January having been read and confirmed, the catch-words of the subsequent Committee meetings were also read. A matter of special interest recorded in the minutes was the acceptance of the office of Visitor by the Master of Balliol, Dr. Edward Caird, in succession to the late Right Hon. Professor Max Müller.

On the motion of the Rev. H. E. DOWSON, seconded by the Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL, the President was elected a member of the Committee, in the place of the late Mr. J. Holme Nicholson.

The MASTER of BALLIOL then moved a resolution of grateful acknowledgment of the labours of the Principal, professors, and lecturers during the past session, and took the opportunity of thanking the Committee for the honour of his election to the office of Visitor. He was, he said, one of those who belonged to the class known in Scotland as Stickit Ministers, persons who, for reasons which need not be mentioned, could not go on with their theological studies. But he still had enough of the clergyman about him to feel at home in the office of Visitor, and he was in full sympathy with the resolution. He had the pleasure and advantage of the friendship of the professors, whose labours were worthy of everything good that could be said of them.

The Rev. C. T. POYNTING, in seconding the resolution, referred to the unusual interest of the examinations which had just taken place, and said that it was a privilege to old students of the College to come up from year to year and to renew their expressions of indebtedness to the professors. They were men who had given up the great happiness of their pastorates to devote themselves to the work of the College, and he wished to assure them that they exercised a larger pastorate of manifold helpfulness, of which their old students enjoyed the benefit. It was a heartfelt expression of gratitude that they offered in that resolution.

Mr. G. H. LEIGH moved, and Mr. RUSSELL SCOTT seconded, a resolution of thanks to the Visitors, and of special acknowledgment to the Rev. S. A. Steinthal for his address, which he was asked to allow to be printed and circulated.

The usual resolution for the admission of students for the new session was then passed, including the admission of a Japanese and a Hindu student, and the students having entered the library, the President presented certificates to Mr. E. G. Evans and Mr. A. R. Andreae, who had completed the College course. Essay prizes were also presented to Messrs. F. H. Vaughan, R. P. Farley, E. Lockett, A. H. Thomas, J. Ewart, and G. A. Ferguson. Mr. Ferguson received also the Russell Martineau prize for special proficiency in Hebrew and Old Testament studies, and a further gift of a copy of Dr. John Taylor's "Hebrew Concordance," two folio volumes, which had belonged to the late Dr. Martineau and contained his autograph.

A vote of thanks to the President, moved by Dr. DRUMMOND, seconded by the Rev. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, and supported by the Rev. JOSEPH WOOD, was carried by acclamation. The President, in acknowledging the vote, spoke of his great interest in the College, and referred with special gratification to the coming of a Japanese student. He drew attention to the inevitable falling away of subscriptions through the death of old supporters of the College, and appealed to deputy treasurers to secure new subscribers.

The meeting then terminated.

GREAT HUCKLOW HOLIDAY HOME.

COMPLETION OF THE SCHEME AND OPENING CEREMONY.

THE Manchester District Sunday-school Association has been engaged during the past three years in carrying on a splendid pioneer work in Sunday-school co-operative holidays. The ideal aimed at is that schools—minister, teachers, and scholars—should be enabled to take a week's holiday together during the summer, living together as one great family and enjoying the opportunities of getting to know each other which such an experience affords. The Home has steadily grown as the ideal has spread in the schools, the Committee being anxious not to move too far in advance of the requirements of the schools. For the first year the schools were accommodated in hired buildings; last year a day-room and kitchen were erected and bedrooms were hired; this year spacious dormitories have been erected, and the Home as a whole is now as complete and perfect for its purpose as care and forethought could make it. The buildings are nicely grouped together, and they occupy an excellent situation on the face of a hill and well backed by a ridge of hills covered with trees. In the front they form a kind of open quadrangle, the day-room being in centre, and the dormitories on either side, while the kitchen, pantry, maids' room and box-room are grouped at the back. The lavatory arrangements are ample and excellent in character, and great care has been taken to make the sanitary arrangements generally as perfect as possible. Each of the dormitories is divided into two large rooms, each of which contains two cubicles for teachers, and affords accommodation for twenty-five beds, making a total of one hundred beds in the Home itself, with a few additional ones in the cottages. The buildings are of corrugated iron, lined with pitchpine, and they have been erected from the plans of Mr. W. Canning, architect, Manchester, by Messrs. Hill and Lomas, of Tideswell. The opening ceremony was held on Saturday last, and great satisfaction was expressed with the work of builders and architect.

There was a large gathering of ministers and friends to mark the completion of the work. The President of the Sunday-School Association—the Rev. S. A. Steinthal—took the chair, and amongst those present were the Revs. J. C. Street, C. Peach, S. H. Street, G. Street, W. G. Atack, W. Reynolds, W. Harrison, J. M. Bass, L. Scott, and W. H. Rose; Messrs. G. H. Leigh, P. Leigh (Monton), D. A. Little, R. Wade (Bowdon), W. H. Talbot, H. Marsden, J. H. Pimley, A. Greg (Manchester), J. H. Brooks (Wilmslow), J. B. Wostinholm, W. R. Stevenson (Sheffield), and many others—making with the Revs. J. and R. C. Moore, of Hindley and Horwich, and about eighty of their scholars and teachers who were entering into residence in the Home a party of about two hundred. After the singing of a hymn, prayer was offered by the Rev. W. Reynolds, and the Secretary read many letters of apology from absent friends. The opening ceremony was performed by Mr. G. H. Leigh, and, in introducing him, the President remarked how largely the realisation of their aim had been due to the munificence of Mr. Leigh and his family, as well as to that of Mrs. J. Worthington and others.

Mr. LEIGH, in the course of his address, spoke of the great pleasure which such a Home must give to town children, and he begged them to use it wisely and well so that its possibilities as a happy and recreative holiday centre might remain unabated for many years to come. Mr. Leigh then unlocked one of the dormitories into which he was followed by the whole company, an unfortunate change in the weather having made it become desirable to conclude the proceedings under cover.

The Rev. J. C. STREET moved the thanks of the company to Mr. Leigh, which was supported by Councillor Marsden and Mr. R. Wade, and carried with acclamation.

The Rev. C. PEACH then explained the new arrangements which had been made for the management of the Home. The Rev. S. H. Street had been appointed Superintendent Minister of the three High Peak chapels, and he was now residing in Great Hucklow. The Committee had therefore arranged for him also to act as Superintendent of the Home. Mr. Peach said that while they all sympathised with Mr. Street in the domestic anxiety which had compelled him to remove from Manchester, they were all grateful to him for taking up this work which they felt would be absolutely safe under his strong and sympathetic guidance. Mr. Peach then moved a resolution of cordial thanks and welcome to Mr. Street, which was seconded by the Rev. W. Harrison, and heartily carried.

Mr. STREET, in replying, spoke of the great good which the Home had done in connection with his former school in Manchester, and earnestly insisted upon keeping in mind the ideal with which they had set out—namely, that this was a Sunday-school Home where schools should, by the intercourse of daily life, be knit into closer ties of unity and affection. The President then pronounced the benediction, after which the whole company proceeded to the day-room, where tea was served.

It may be stated that, although the formal opening of the Home took place last Saturday, it has actually been occupied since Whit-week, when the Moss Side school opened the season. It is now booked right up to September 6. Some of the schools do not, however, require all the accommodation, and small parties or individuals can still be arranged for in several weeks upon application to the Secretary, Mr. D. A. Little, Hatherley, Bowdon, or the Rev. S. H. Street, B.A., Great Hucklow, Eyam, Sheffield. It may also be mentioned that the building and furnishing of the Home has cost about £1,350, towards which the sum of £500 has still to be raised. No further help is then required, as the Home is made to be quite self-supporting. A charge of five shillings for scholars and six shillings and sixpence for teachers and scholars over sixteen is made for board, and a further charge of a little over one shilling each per week for lodging, and these charges were sufficient last year to cover all expenses. It is believed that the balance-sheet will be equally satisfactory this year, and it is only the outstanding balance on the building account about which the Committee is anxious. Anyone who can do anything towards the cost of this excellent work is requested to send to the Financial Secretary, Mr. J. H. Pimley, 44, Bishop-street, Moss Side, Manchester.

REMONSTRANT SYNOD OF ULSTER.

THE annual meeting was held on Tuesday, June 18, in the First Presbyterian Church, Belfast. Service was held at noon, when the Moderator, the Rev. W. E. Mallone, preached from 1 Tim. ii. 5, after which, the Synod having been constituted, the roll was called by the clerk, the Rev. J. Hall, and the Rev. J. A. Miskimmon was elected to succeed as Moderator. The routine business was carried through, and resolutions were passed commemorating the late Revs. George Hill and Thomas Smyth and Mr. H. J. M'Cance, D.L. The resolution as to Mr. Hill placed on record the Synod's sense of his faithful services as an active minister, in past years, at Ballymoney and Crumlin; its appreciation of his public work during the last half-century; and its admiration of the genius which, distinguishing him as the careful historian and the cultured poet, has placed his name on the roll of those whom grateful Ulster will not forget.

The resolution recording the great loss sustained by the death of Mr. M'Cance spoke of him in the following terms:—

As a faithful and devout layman, as a director of the Church's finance, as a friend of the orphan, as one ever ready with the kindly aids of his counsel and experience in every good work, he rendered in the conduct of his life a noble witness to the reality of his faith. His influence and his example were potent while he was given to us, and the remembrance of his virtues will abide in our hearts.

The reports of Presbyteries were submitted by the various clerks and passed.

A report of the General Purposes Committee was adopted, dealing with the question of an excerpt from the Code of those parts in constant use, brought up to date, with an introduction embodying the original resolutions which constituted the Synod, and a sketch of the origin of the present Code. The report showed that the work was making satisfactory progress.

The Rev. A. GORDON then moved the following resolutions:—

1. That the existing text of the Synod's Code of Discipline, as revised up to date, be transcribed in full, and kept on hand as the Synod's existing Code. 2. That a series of Excerpts be made, with all omissions marked, and that these be printed, with the Fundamental Principles of 1830 prefixed.

The resolutions, after discussion, were adopted, and further reports having been received, the meeting was concluded with the Benediction.

ASSOCIATION OF IRISH NON-SUBSCRIBING PRESBYTERIANS AND OTHER FREE CHRISTIANS.

THE annual meeting was held on Wednesday, June 19, in the First Presbyterian Church, Belfast. Service was held at noon, when the retiring President, the Rev. M. S. Dunbar, preached from Matt. xiii. 30, on the subject of "Toleration." The meeting followed in the afternoon, when the President delivered his address, and on the motion of the Rev. W. NAPIER, seconded by the Rev. A. GORDON, Mr. Thomas Andrews, of Comber, was unanimously elected President. In making the motion, Mr. Napier said that it was the first time a layman had been called to occupy that chair, and he looked forward to many such elections in future. Mr. Andrews was in sympathy with their non-subscribing principles by inheritance and by conviction; he would bring to the office great ability, a splendid business training, and great personal popularity.

The new PRESIDENT, in taking the chair, said that he had hesitated to accept that honour, but had yielded on the ground that it was an attempt to enlist the keener sympathy of the laity in the work of their church.

The congregation of Moneyrea was admitted to the Association, and the Rev. W. H. Drummond was elected a member.

Various reports were considered and adopted; a Temperance Committee, with the Rev. R. Lyttle as convener, was appointed; a special committee was appointed, on the motion of the Revs. D. WALMSLEY and W. NAPIER, to consider and report on changes in future procedure; a resolution on gambling and the prominence given by newspapers to betting news was moved by the Rev. D. WALMSLEY, and unanimously adopted, and after further routine business, the meeting was brought to a close.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Bristol: Lewin's Mead Domestic Mission (Appointment).—A hearty invitation to the post of Domestic Missionary has been given to, and accepted by, Mr. J. B. Robinson, of this city. Mr. Robinson, who at present is superintendent of a large Boys' Home, has had a long experience of work among the poor, and enters upon his new sphere of labour with excellent credentials.

Clifton.—There was a large congregation at Oakfield-road Church last Sunday evening, when the Rev. Dr. Warschauer preached on "Tolstoy's Unitarian Manifesto"—the distinguished writer's "Reply to the Decree of Excommunication," a special advance proof of which had been kindly forwarded to the preacher by Tolstoy's English representatives. After dealing with Tolstoy's uncompromising repudiation of the Trinity, his insistance upon the pure humanity of Christ, the greatest revealer of God's will, and upon the all-sufficiency in God as Love, the sermon concluded: "We of this Church, who stand so largely by and for the religious opinions advocated by Tolstoy, have every reason to feel thankful for the impetus free Christianity must receive from this notable pronouncement. Excommunicated from the Church called orthodox, its author might be—but what then? Since he could never be excommunicated from the larger Church of Humanity, never separated from the brotherhood of man, never cut off from the grace of Christ, from the love of God, or from the fellowship of the Holy Spirit."

Deal.—On Sunday morning the Rev. T. Shakespeare preached from the text, "All the paths of the Lord are mercy and truth," and denounced the unnecessary cruelties of the concentration camps in South Africa. He read passages from Miss Hobhouse's report.

Eastbourne.—The Rev. George St. Clair has concluded his ministry at Eastbourne, to the great regret of friends who appreciated not only his Sunday services, but his week-day lectures. We understand that an attempt to establish a Unitarian congregation in Eastbourne, carried on for some years under great discouragement, is now to be abandoned.

East London Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The members held their annual summer excursion at High Beech on Saturday, June 22. Nineteen sat down to tea at Forest Lodge, and were joined later by others. A pleasant evening was spent in the Forest.

Glossop.—On the 16th inst. the anniversary services in connection with Fitzalan-street Church were held, and were in every way most successful. The preacher, afternoon and evening, was the Rev. A. W. Fox, M.A., of Todmorden, whose impressive discourses were listened to with very great interest by large congregations, that of the evening completely filling the church. Prior to the afternoon service, the usual procession of the school and congregation took place, and hymns were sung in the town square to the accompaniment of a string band. The music at both services consisting of special hymns, anthems, and solos, the whole under the direction of Mr. J. J. Roberts, A.R.C.O., was of a pleasing and highly creditable character. The two collections amounted to nearly £51, an increase of £10 on last year, and the highest sum ever realised in this church.

Hinckley.—The Sunday-school sermons were preached last Sunday by the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, of Nottingham. Large congregations attended, and the collections were in advance of any previous year.

London: Essex Church.—The Hospital Sunday collections amounted to £175. The "Church Calendar" contains further reminiscences of the Rev. W. H. Channing, who was the first to hold free services in Kensington. The Vesper Services will be continued in July, followed by brief addresses by the Rev. F. K. Freeston, on "The Religious Parables of Count Tolstoi."

London: Stratford.—Services, conducted by the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, were held on Sunday, June 23, in connection with the Young People's Guild. Special music was rendered by members of the Guild. Collections were taken on behalf of a fund for the renovation of the schoolroom.

Loughborough (Appointment).—The Rev. Peter Dean, who has been Unitarian minister for twenty-five years at Walsall, has received and accepted an unanimous invitation to the pulpit of the Victoria-street Church, and will begin his ministry there in October next.

South Wales: Rhondda Valley.—The open-air meetings that were started in the Rhondda last year, by the Revs. Dr. Griffiths (Pontypridd) and David Rees (Pentre), have been continued by the latter this year. On the evening of Friday week the concluding address in a series of five, expository of the larger faith of Unitarian Christianity, was delivered at Ferndale. The speaker used as platform the stone pedestal surrounding the central lamp-post on the Strand. The audiences averaged about 160, the crowds increasing as the series proceeded. At the last meeting the speaker had often to appeal to the crowd to keep the pavements clear. The hearing has been most attentive, and many questions were asked. Much English literature has been distributed gratis (granted for the purpose by the B. and F. U. A.) and Welsh literature sold.

FROM MR. T. FISHER UNWIN'S LIST.

MAKERS of the NINETEENTH CENTURY. By RICHARD A. ARMSTRONG. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. net. Copies can be had at Essex Hall.

Carlyle, Darwin, Gladstone, George Eliot, Ibsen, Matthew Arnold, Bradlaugh, G. F. Watts, Mazzini, Queen Victoria, Newman, Arthur Penrhyn Stanley, and James Martineau are the "makers" the author discusses, and with some of them he has been brought into close contact. The papers are liberal, informative, and sympathetic, and will appeal strongly to the Nonconformists (and more especially, perhaps, to the Unitarians) as well as the ordinary student of modern history.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE unanimity with which the meeting of the Provincial Assembly at Manchester adopted the resolution on the war, which we print in our report this week, is surely very significant, and the more so, as the political attachments of our friends in the North are as various as those in other parts of the country. Two votes only were recorded against the revised resolution, and one of these was given (the voter himself told the Manchester Guardian) because it was not strong enough in its censures. The tone of the speeches strikes us as admirable, alike in the endeavour to avoid provoking party feeling, and in the expression of those sentiments of shame and horror which are shared, we believe, by far more people at this time than our governors suspect.

THE revised Royal Declaration against Popery, recommended by the Lords' Select Committee, does not commend itself to all parties. The Roman Catholics cannot be expected to embrace it cordially, and though they would no doubt greatly prefer it to the present form, they will not, we are told, speak in its favour. The High Church leaders are dissatisfied with the reference to the "Protestant religion," which would seem to imply that the English Church is Protestant—a thing abhorrent to their feelings. The Orange leaders cling with fondness to the old form, probably because no more irritating form can be hoped for in these days of courteous public life. The Declaration as amended is probably acceptable to most English people, though we think a good many of our readers, though not lords, could devise a better.

RECENT numbers of the Christian Register have given ample reports of the anniversary meetings of the American Unitarian Association at Boston. The seventy-sixth annual meeting of the Association was held in the Tremont Temple on May 21, when the President, the Rev. Samuel A. Eliot, D.D., gave an address in which he welcomed the delegates present as members of Free Churches who met, not for the purposes of Church government, since their churches were strictly independent and congregational, but for counsel and co-operation. Those Free Churches, he said, were the product of deep spiritual causes. To them, pledged to no settled creed, Christianity was not a theory to be explained or a system to be defended, but a life to be lived.

There are many ways in which the impulse to religion may be stirred, and which are widely utilised at the present time. Some souls are moved by symbolism—by ritual, by beauty of colour or of form, and many by the sense of organisation—by force of numbers, by external conformity and discipline. All these agencies may be legitimate instruments, and yet to none of them can we who gather here confide our hope. We refuse to be entangled in the machinery of religion, because we confide in that form of faith which sets an individual soul face to face with a living God. "A Unitarian," said Dr. Peabody, speaking for our fellowship to the International Congregational Council, "is indifferent to the accessories of religion, because he is dominated by the desire for reality." Others may create more ornate churches, more impressive ceremonials, more substantial organisations; it is our desire to be acquainted at first hand with truth. It would be a vast misfortune if these free churches of ours were to set themselves to compete with more decorative communions in point of ritual or with more highly organised communions in ecclesiastical discipline. To us belongs the more sober, the more difficult, and, as I believe, the more exalted function of dwelling near the sources of truth; of making religion practical; of preaching and living the more abundant life; "of encouraging the personal and direct approach, unmediated by any priest or form, of the individual soul to a living God."

WITH independence of mind and soul, Dr. Eliot said, and the power of personal religion, they must not forget that "freedom is only the first lesson in self-government," and their churches were feeling now more strongly than ever that they had a common work to do, and formed a living and organic unity. The congregational system in good hands, he was assured, would develop the highest working power of a Christian church, not indeed for the building up of ecclesiasticism, but for the building up of the kingdom of God among men. They must measure their success, not chiefly by its outward growth of enrolled members, but by the practical power of their principles over the life of the people. They must learn to overcome the weaknesses of a self-absorbed individualism by disciplined order and vigorous co-operation, and let their just pride of independence be qualified by a deep and true desire for unity.

No complacent self-glorification will help. Boasting is a thoroughly provincial habit. Our loyalty to our religious ideals and the institutions that embody them is not a sentiment to be loudly advertised. It is like a family instinct—in the child an unreasoning devotion, in the man an intelligent love. Through a knowledge of a church's lineage, through love of its association, through a subtle traditionary feeling in the blood, through a thousand influences that come to us, out of the past, and are interwoven into all our moral fibres, there has grown in us and before us an ideal. When every man among us beyond his home affections, beyond his every-day concerns, feels the illimitable attractiveness of that ideal, then the church to which such individuals belong will begin to have a great and progressive and beneficent life. Its influence will penetrate into everything that is done and capable of being done. Commerce, politics, education—all will be more vigorously wrought. Poets and artists will again spring up in our company, a daring faith will inspire the efforts of our fellowship—all will rejoice in the same idealism and live the same endeavouring life.

THE report of the Secretary, the Rev. C. E. St. John, was instinct with the same vigorous spirit as Dr. Eliot's presidential address, and embodied reports from superintendent ministers in different parts of the country, recording earnest, progressive work, and pointing to needs and shortcomings, and the methods by which they should be met. Among the resolutions subsequently passed were the following, moved by the Rev. C. F. Dole :—

Whereas our simple and ennobling form of religion is as yet little known, and vastly needed, and whereas the most popular possible presentation of it is everywhere necessary in order to bring it to the knowledge of the American people,

Therefore, Resolved, That we ask our churches, and particularly those which enjoy the use of missionary funds, thoughtfully to consider means and methods by which they may more fully and effectually proclaim our religion to all the people.

We earnestly ask whether it is not possible to make more economical use of our ministers, many of whom now give public service to only one small congregation once a week; also, whether the stronger churches will not consent to put their ministers at the service of this Association for a certain number of Sundays in each year.

Finally, we hold that our churches will be untrue to their faith, if they are not at the front, in every community where they are organised, in all movements for honest and impartisan government, for the best methods in education, for more just distribution of wealth, for sympathetic and friendly relations between employers and the employed, for the amelioration of the condition of the poor, for the same rule of purity for men as for women, for checking the enormous and corrupting use of intoxicating drinks, for international arbitration and against the curse of militarism, for genuine democracy and brotherhood.

We aim, therefore, with renewed consecration, to help establish the free and humanitarian Church of America. We hold that all the illustrious lessons of the past urge us to serve as pioneers for the future.

Of these resolutions, the first part, as to Church work, was unanimously adopted, the last two paragraphs, as to public duty were also, after discussion, passed.

PRESENT DAY RELIGIOUS PROBLEMS IN HUNGARY.

BY PROFESSOR GEORGE BOROS, D.D.*

In Hungary religious and political systems were originally rooted in the fertile soil of liberty. The continuous history of one thousand years testifies that in this country nothing can have a long life which is contrary to liberty. Before the great Church was split into eastern and western branches just at the beginning of the eleventh century, Hungary's king received a crown from the Roman bishop, the Pope, and in acknowledgment accepted the Roman form of Christianity, though the Magyar race had "a natural tendency towards the more rational Eastern religious thinking." Several kings were adorned with the title "Saint," in acknowledgment of their services to Rome, but none after the Reformation. Hungary was a fertile ground for the most rational kind of reform. Unitarianism was not only accepted, but has been maintained ever since. Catholicism so completely lost supremacy in Transylvania, that for nearly two hundred years she had no regular bishop there.

Great changes in politics caused a transformation in the Church. The long roll of native kings ceased, and the Habsburg dynasty which gained the throne was always most zealously Catholic, and secured all possible advantages for that Church. Protestantism suffered tremendous losses, but the purely Magyar population never deserted Protestant liberalism, and as soon as liberal thought from France and Germany entered the field, a reawakening began which will never be stopped again. The first half of the nineteenth century secured liberty in politics and in literature; and as a natural result of these two, Unitarianism in 1848 was acknowledged as a State religion for the whole of Hungary, having equal rights with the Roman Catholic and Protestant Churches. The second half of the nineteenth century shows a very attractive picture of progress in education, in science as well as in religious reform. This movement was crowned in 1896 by the Bill of Religious Freedom, which secured freedom and tolerance for every religious sect, and even for those who do not wish to belong to churches of any kind.

The spirit of liberty and the acknowledged power of State legislation were most conspicuously manifested in 1897 in the Civil Marriage Law. The Roman Catholic Church was most seriously affected. The usage of 900 years and all the influence attending it, were at once taken out of her hands. No wonder that she has taken up the defensive position, opening a strong and fearless fight all along the line. This reactionary movement is led by the high-priesthood and by some of the richest families of the country. They gain considerable support from Austria and also from Rome.

When the Civil Marriage Law was passed the Government was in the strong hands of a Protestant Prime Minister, but still the reactionary party succeeded in placing a rich young Count in the Transylvanian Roman Catholic Episcopal Chair. This was very important, because Transylvania has always been the stronghold of religious freedom, and now the new leader carries on his work with the intention to gather all the lost sheep back to the Church. The clergy are, indeed, more active than ever. Jesuits now find their way to places where four or five different denominations were living a most peaceful life together. The result, however, is not equivalent to the energy exerted. Their influence hardly reaches beyond the circle of sensitive womanhood.

The most encouraging feature is that the State authorities continue their work in strengthening liberal tendencies. Protestant ministers, who used to be very poorly paid, now receive considerable aid and support from the State's treasury.

It may seem curious that in discussing a religious subject we are dealing with political and ecclesiastical questions; but here and now the foremost question is still the consolidation of a national Magyar State. We have not yet surmounted the questions of outward organisation, and the smaller churches especially have to retire into their fortresses secured by law, and keep to their organic outer power. We are still always on the defensive. This, however, does not mean that there is stagnation here in the domain of ideas. Quite the contrary. Religious thought is in a high tide of liberalism. Even the common people, who are out of the direct influence of the orthodox churches, are inclined to rationalism. There is not the slightest doubt about it, that a great multitude of people all over the country want new and sound religious ideas. They want a modern form of Christianity, and it is quite a mistake to believe that the high-priesthood will attain to any great result with its most recent attempts to carry religion into politics and force the ecclesiastical symbols of Romanism into the educational institutions.

Along with this, one would like to see a vigorous reawakening and activity on the side of liberal Protestantism. There is some, no doubt, but it does not touch the heart of the people. Theirs is not the gospel wanted, because they are trying to put new wine into old bottles. They seem to be of opinion that old conceptions about the chief subjects of faith can be saved. They forget that people are now accustomed to straightforward speech in all departments of life. They leave out of consideration the fact that people now look at things with their own eyes and judge with their own mind; therefore they will not accept even religious ideas if they are contradicted by the voice of their soul and the feeling of their heart.

If the teachings of religion were brought into harmony with the present day general tide of thought; if, instead of looking for outward authorities, teachers would persuade men that God secured to each one of us a soul able to understand His very word, and also that each man may approach God if he would be born anew, then perhaps a new birth in the religious life of the whole would be possible.

I am fully persuaded that a sincere liberalism, founded on the pure and simple teaching of Jesus, has a great and lasting future before it in this country. But it must be borne in mind that a religion which is to be the religion of the Hungarian race must be simple, sober, and sweet, to be easily appreciated, must harmonise with the general straightforward character of the race, and be a friend to freedom, political as well as ecclesiastical. This ought to be a religion adapted to the age with the central idea of the unity of God, unity of man and unity of soul.

If any kind of Hungarian church leaves out of consideration the fact that a Hungarian mind wants to be in harmony with itself even in religion, and instead of nourishing the idea of the divine unity, tries to implant into it either the Logos idea, which is of Greek origin, or the idea of a God-Mother, which is of pagan origin, it is working against the unity of the nation, and preparing the way for that danger which is already in sight in the absorbing tendency on one side of the Germanic, on the other of the Slavonic races.

That such a solution of the difficulty by the institution of a rational faith is possible, the history of the last four centuries most convincingly proves. Only on this principle can the fact be explained that the belief in the divine unity no power could eradicate from the soul of the Hungarian or Székely people during four hundred years of preservation.

I am not going to say that that kind of religion which we call Unitarian, in its present form, is just the one which quite expresses all the ideas of the Magyar nation; but I do say that when a nation, like their own, has succeeded in solving the more difficult problems on democratic principles, the time is approaching when in ecclesiastical and religious life also, it shall be seen that the remains of middle-age ecclesia militans are out of date. They might have been very useful when all the world was living in the destructive spirit of war, but now when we hear everywhere the good tidings of "Peace on earth and goodwill towards men," they have lost their meaning, and, being quite contrary to the spirit of Jesus, must be given up—the sooner, the better. This grand change is already begun. Sure signs are seen here and there that out of the mustard seed shall grow a great tree.

The preparation of an ideal future is begun, perhaps far more effectively in other parts of the world than in Hungary, and I have no doubt that a grand and noble religious movement like that of the International Council will add a new impulse to it, for which all those who wish the progress of mankind do most sincerely pray.

THE PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF LANCASHIRE AND CHESHIRE.

ADDRESS BY THE PRESIDENT, MR. JOHN DENDY, AT OLDHAM, JUNE 13.

THE roll which has just been read will have recalled to your minds the losses which we have sustained during the past year. It is not for me to attempt an eulogium upon the valued friends who have passed away, but it is fitting, I think, that all of us should at the commencement of our proceedings offer to their memories a tribute of sorrow and respect.

But if we have experienced losses, we have also to rejoice in gains. It is my pleasant duty to offer, in your name, to the ministers, who during the last twelve months have settled in our province, a hearty and sincere welcome, wishing them God-speed in their work and promising them our sympathy and good will.

I have referred to losses. One loss, the full importance of which cannot yet be estimated, has affected us in common with all our fellow-countrymen. I refer, of course, to the death of Queen Victoria. In her person she represented much of what is best in our national life. An exalted sense of duty, a sincere love of her country, strong family affection, a deep sympathy with suffering—all these found in her a noble representative.

If by law she was the head of that great National Church, outside of which we have to stand, she was also by virtue of her character a natural head and leader for all, who, whether in any Church or outside of all Churches, were striving after righteousness, peace, and goodwill. In so far as these things characterise our civic life we may claim to have been in the best sense loyal subjects of the great Queen. It behoves us now that she is gone, and a new era is opening before us, to seek inspiration for our public and private conduct in her high example, and to prove that our appreciation was genuine by lives dedicated as hers was to a noble service of the common weal.

A new era is indeed opening before us with the commencement of this twentieth century, a future over which many clouds are gathering. The Queen had outlived the epoch which will bear her name. She had survived almost all those who by their achievements made that epoch great. They are gone and lesser men now fill their places. In literature, in art, in politics, science, and theology, is it not true that we have no longer among us men so great as those whom we have known? Even in the business world it seems as though the constructive and enterprising genius which, adopting the idea of Free Trade, pushed the commerce of Britain into all quarters of the globe were being succeeded by a spirit, which looks rather to clever financing, combination and monopoly, than to fruitful production and beneficent exchange.

Our predecessors have built up a mighty fabric which it is hard for us to sustain. They have opened out for us a world vaster, mentally, socially, and politically, than was ever known before. Our task is to live in it worthily, and it is no easy one. We talk about the burden of Empire from a merely political point of view. It is a heavy one indeed. Whether it can be adequately sustained by a people who seem inclined to substitute for the old teaching "Righteousness exalteth a nation" a new doctrine—namely, that Providence, as a supreme illustration of the survival of the fittest, has destined the English-speaking nations to dominate the world, and must therefore take the responsibility for any unpleasantnesses incidental to the process—that is a question which remains to be answered.

But there is another Empire which the Victorian era has given to us in common with others, in regard to which our difficulties and responsibilities are almost equally great—the Empire of human thought to which modern science has introduced us, making us citizens of a universe more wonderful and glorious than was ever conceived of before.

Moreover, we are confronted by a number of social and political problems of the gravest kind which call urgently for solution, but with which the nation makes little determined effort to deal. It has energy and enthusiasm for war, but not for these things. Luxury increases. The struggle for wealth grows more absorbing. We have entered on a period of increasing armaments, increasing debt, increasing taxation. At home we have much discontent. Abroad we are hated as few peoples have ever been. We are engaged in a great war, which all of us lament, and not a few of us feel to be a grave stain on the fair fame of our beloved country—a prolonged horror mitigated only in some degree by the courage and fidelity of brave men on both sides, whose lives have been sacrificed by the thousand to the incapacity and ambition of their political leaders.

Englishmen of the twentieth century will need to ponder well Matthew Arnold's words:—

Children of men, not that your age excel
In pride of life the ages of your sires;
But that ye think clear, feel deep, bear fruit well
The friend of man desires.

It is natural that to-day we should look forward and ask ourselves what part we are to play in the new era. We are at once met by the everlasting alternative, the choice between self and service, which is as truly the problem for Churches as it is for individuals.

Shall we concern ourselves chiefly with the multiplication of our numbers and the perpetuation of our names and present forms of belief, or shall we as a first question ask ourselves what service is there we can render to our fellow-men in the difficult time before us, and how can we best discharge it?

The first way is the natural outcome of the sectarian spirit. It leads to a fruitless counting of numbers, to a perpetual morbid introspection, to vain attempts at organisation, without considering whether there is any life to be organised. The second is the way of the Master. The first has for its object a mere church, militant and if possible triumphant as much over other Churches as over sin. The second aims at realising the Kingdom, the Holy City, in which the seer could see no Temple, no separate Church, "for the Lord God the Almighty, and the Lamb, are the temple thereof." "Ah," but some will say, "that is visionary, not practical." Be it so; though ill will be the fate of those whose practical endeavours are not inspired by some beautiful vision of the times to be. What but such a vision sustains the philanthrophist, the reformer, the politician of the nobler kind? They look forward, not to a mere triumph of their own views, but to a world made better and happier through their efforts. Shall the Churches be content with a lower standard, a less lofty vision?

Churches like all other human institutions must find their ultimate justification in the service they can render to mankind. What service does the new era specially demand of the Churches?

The great need of our time, the one thing which can make us adequate to the duties of our vast inheritance, is an effective religious belief, pervading and dominating our lives. The service of which above all others this nation stands in need is a renewal of living belief in God and in goodness in every department of life. Professor Harnack has recently given us a definition of Christianity: "Eternal life in the midst of time, by the strength and under the eyes of God." It is a great saying, but it implies the existence of two things—an effective belief in God, and an effective belief in the practicability of that eternal or Christian life for us common men.

Let me illustrate what I mean by effective belief. We believe in the existence and presence of our fellow-men. It is a belief which is from moment to moment effective upon our lives, modifying our actions, our words, and our thoughts. We believe in God omnipresent and omniscient. Is that a belief which is equally effective upon our lives? We believe in the propriety of exertion to secure the good things of this world in an honourable way, and we act vigorously upon that belief. We believe also in the supreme worth of personal holiness. Is that an equally effective belief, the source of equally strenuous effort? Have we not here two kinds of belief, and are we not tempted to cry of the one—

It moves us not—great God! I'd rather be
A Pagan suckled in a creed outworn;
So might I, standing on this pleasant lea,
Have glimpses that would make me less forlorn.

I do not wish to suggest any conscio s dishonesty in our professions of belief; only that judged by its fruits in the national life, the religion of our day is somehow lacking in effective vitality. On the other hand, is it not true that a great and honourable honesty keeps many outside the churches, our own included whose language they cannot use, and that the loss of the churches thereby is great?

Now it seems to me that, whatever else may be necessary, two conditions are essential to an effective religious belief.

(1.) The range of our religious thought must be co-extensive with that of our other thoughts. There must be no regions into which our investigations may lead us where our religious thought cannot follow, where we cannot find God. In the pursuit of truth of any kind we must still feel ourselves in His presence.

(2.) The field in which we recognise that our religion should be the dominating influence must be not a part only, but the whole of our sphere of action.

If these conditions be not fulfilled—and I do not think they are adequately fulfilled to-day—there arises an inconsistency, and with it a certain unreality in our religious belief. They have been fulfilled under the most varying forms of belief culture and organisation. Take, for instance, the "Divina Commedia"—a perennial fountain of religious inspiration, though cast in a mould so alien to our modern thought. Is not one great secret of its power this—that into Dante's story of things divine are woven not only his poetic thoughts, but also all that he knew of science, philosophy, politics, human conduct or human affection? Every kind of action, public and private alike, finds its place in the tale, and receives its final estimation from the point of view of religion. The most profound experience of that age found itself in accord with the most profound religious feeling. So his religion became effective for him and for untold hosts of his fellow-men.

It is interesting to note how this sublime faith enabled Dante to meet that apparent want of mercy and justice in the Divine government, which, though in a different form, was a difficulty to him as it often is to us. He concludes that the Divine justice is not to be measured, nor fully understood, by human intelligence.

Wherefore into that Justice ever blest
The vision which your world receives no more
Can enter than the eye in ocean's breast,
Which, though it see the bottom near the shore,
Far out at sea beholds not; yet 'tis there,
But the deep waters hide it evermore.

Our weaker faith confronted with what is too lightly termed the cruelty of nature, often prefers to commit suicide rather than wait for fuller light.

Consider for a moment what has been happening in our own churches during the last century. We have been taught that in matters pertaining to religion we must look to our own reason, conscience, and highest feeling as ultimate authorities. What fails to commend itself to them cannot be buttressed by any other power. And, if not so openly acknowledged, the same principle is more or less operative in other communities.

Into this larger freedom we of the laity, who, for the most part, are neither great scholars nor great thinkers, have stepped with perhaps somewhat too light a heart, bearing with us a set of religious ideas and phrases which have had their origin in a world very different from that in which we find ourselves.

If a family of children accustomed to live in a simple cottage and to feel themselves constantly at home in the visible presence of their parents were suddenly set to inhabit a vast palace with liberty to roam through it at their will, how difficult might it not be for them to find again the sanctities of home and realise that the parental care was adequate to guard them there also!

Something like this I imagine to be what has happened to us. The task before us is to find our God again in that new and vaster universe in which we now live. But it will not be quite the same God whom we shall rediscover there. The old phrases and the old thoughts will not all do in this new world. The problem is not, as is sometimes said, to sweep away all the accretions which the centuries have witnessed to primitive Christianity. It is rather to go forward, in the spirit of Jesus, into the vaster universe, the more complex society, which surrounds us, and frame for ourselves conceptions of God and the Divine Providence which shall be adequate to fill them. Our mental horizon is enormously extended, and the difficulty is none the less that for most of us, the view is somewhat misty. We all know something of natural science in these days. No doubt our knowledge is not generally very profound or accurate, but we have a certain amount of familiarity with its leading principles and discoveries. This knowledge we often find it hard to reconcile with the thought of God, as it finds expression in familiar phrases of hymn and prayer, lesson and chant, which by mere dint of repetition are calculated to produce greater effect than the explanatory utterances of the pulpit. The religious mind clings fondly and naturally to old forms of expression. It is for ever trying to put the new wine into old bottles, to give new meanings to old phrases. How striking are these words of Professor Harnack!

How often and often in the History of Religion has there been a tendency to do away with some traditional form of doctrine or ritual which has ceased to satisfy inwardly, but to do away with it by giving it a new interpretation. The endeavour seems to be succeeding; the temper and the knowledge prevailing at the moment are favourable to it—when lo and behold! the old meaning suddenly comes back again. The actual words of the ritual, of the liturgy, of the official doctrine prove stronger than anything else. If a new religious idea cannot manage to make a radical breach with the past at the critical point—the rest may remain as it is—and procure itself a new "body" it cannot last; it disappears again.

Yes, and I will venture to add that in the meantime it has a disastrous aspect of unreality and insincerity.

I once heard a distinguished astronomer at the close of a brilliant lecture say "Many of you will be wondering how all this affects the belief in a Divine government of the universe," and he went on to say that he had found nothing in science which was inconsistent with a belief in God, only we must enlarge our thoughts of God. That is one of the problems before the Churches in the twentieth century—so to enlarge the popular thought of God, as that it shall once more fill the universe in which we live, and to find adequate expression for the enlarged thought.

Of late we hear less than formerly of the conflict between Science and Religion. It is less noisy, less ostensibly aggressive on both sides, but it does not therefore follow that it is less deadly. What Religion has to do is not to win a victory over science, nor to pass by, ignoring its work. It is rather to assimilate, to take up into herself, whatever Science may have established, and to find therein fresh sources of strength, fresh matter for interpretation. But if she is to do this in sincerity will she not need to modify much of her phraseology and many of her thoughts about God. It is long since Tyndall spoke to us of matter containing "the promise and potency of all terrestrial life"; and Huxley of "the advancing tide of matter threatening to drown our souls, and the tightening grasp of law impeding our freedom." Only when the conceptions of law and matter have been taken up into our thought of God, will such sayings lose their terror for the religious mind.

With regard to natural law, surely this has already been largely done. In its tightening grasp are we not learning to recognise a closer embrace of the Divine, which supports but does not impede the freedom of the soul?

If it be true as Professor Tait has said, and as from the purely scientific point of view it probably is, that "we do not know and are probably incapable of discovering what matter is," then perhaps we need not so greatly dread its advancing tide. For surely the terror lay in our conception of it as something permanently antagonistic to all that we imagine spirit to be—something, to speak popularly and unscientifically, hard, inflexible and dead, needing to be controlled and managed from without in the interests of spiritual life. Yet this obstinate unspiritual stuff seems in these days to be dissolving in our hands. Most of us were, I suppose, brought up to think of matter as ultimately consisting of a number of permanent hard indivisible atoms. Yet these had been otherwise conceived of as mere mass points or centres of force. In our own time Lord Kelvin has given us his vortex-atom theory, whereby—I quote from Professor Ward—"both atoms and ether are resolved into motions of one ultimate fluid." And now the more recent researches are producing new and startling developments of theory. Note the direction in which the physicists themselves are being driven. Professor Oliver Lodge, in a paper on modern views of matter, published last year, after contending that "the atoms of the so-called elements are not simple but compound, every atom being built up of many similar parts or corpuscles," goes on to say:—"There remains the question whether these corpuscles contain anything but an electric charge, whether they have any material nucleus at all, whether electric inertia is not the only inertia there is, whether, in fact, the atom of matter does not resolve itself simply into an aggregate of isolated electric charges or electrons. These questions," he says, "appear likely to be answered in the affirmative."

I have ventured on this subject simply with a view to showing that even in the hands of science itself matter seems to be losing that element of what I have unscientifically called hardness, and fixed antagonism to spirit which made it so difficult to realise the truth of the immanent philosophy and conceive what is really meant by the doctrine of an indwelling God.

The aggressive materialism of the past is giving way. Already the easy fashionable creed of agnosticism—if creed it may be called—makes acknowledgment of a mysterious something lying behind all phenomena, and leaves the door open for a spiritual interpretation of Nature. I have neither the time nor the ability to develop before you to-day what I nevertheless believe to be true—that we are on our way to a spiritual monistic interpretation of Nature, which will once more make possible a belief in God as effective and illuminating as has ever been known. But that it will be a belief which can be adequately expressed in the same language, and illustrated by the same symbols as have been current in the past, that is another question. For it will be a belief which will find God not merely governing and directing everything, but actually and very literally present in everything, from the grimy pavement beneath our feet to the white clouds floating above our heads, inspiring not only what we are pleased to call the beneficent operations of Nature, but also those which we have learned to dread; as truly present in the typhoid germ as in the healing draught. It is a great, a sublime faith which awaits us; but again I ask, will not some restatement, some modification of our thoughts and expressions be necessary? How suggestive is Darwin's comment. "He considers that the theory of evolution is quite compatible with our belief in a God; but that you must remember that different persons have different definitions of what they mean by God?" Readers of the Hibbert Lectures will remember Count D'Alviella's words:—

Attributes which many of us regard as essential to the Deity may be cancelled by the theological system which shall gain the ascendant. We or our children may have to relinquish many a cherished conception of the action of God and the destiny of man.

Then, after words which I will not quote, lest they be misunderstood,—

What cannot die is the conception of a mysterious and superhuman Power, realising Himself in all the laws of the known universe, revealing Himself in the voice of conscience and the spectacle of the world.

Our task is to press forward enlarging and purifying our thoughts about Him until for us once more all Nature will be instinct with the presence of the Divine, echoing back to us the deepest intuitions of our souls, and we shall realise that we, offspring of the Eternal Spirit, are indeed citizens of a spiritual universe.

I think it might easily be shown how on the social side of religion there is the same necessity for an enlargement of ideas. What a tremendous change has taken place in our views as to the wisest methods of charity! Yet it can hardly be said that it is to the churches that we owe our larger thoughts and better methods, or that from them these have received the heartiest support.

Who can doubt that beneath all the excesses of Socialistic utterances there lies a profound truth of the primary duty of making this present life more beautiful and happy for all, which the churches have not yet fully made their own?

But important as right thinking is, it is not the most important element in the religious life. We need greatly to think more clearly about God, not however merely that we may describe Him better, but that we may get nearer to Him and feel His inspiration more fully. Neither the custody of old truths nor the search for new truths is alone a sufficient basis for a religious community. We need also right feeling issuing in right action. Not what we think but what we are, what spirit is in us, is after all the primary question.

What, then, is to be the law of our life, the spirit in us in this new era? Are the life and spirit of Jesus still to be our high example and our guide, in public as in private life, or have we got beyond all that? A plain answer to that question, a clear leading on that matter is the second great service which the new era demands of the churches. It is not a question of the authenticity of texts, or the entire wisdom of all the applications made by Jesus of his doctrine of love and righteousness, considered in the light of the added experience of nineteen centuries. It is a question of whether we really believe in the universal application of that law, and that the spirit of Jesus is still that in which we are to face the complex problems of modern life. Theoretically the members of the churches do, but practically—look at the hosts of prostitutes upon our streets, the organised power of the liquor trade, the growing vice of gambling more than tolerated in many of its forms, the worship of money, the spurious and vainglorious patriotism which inspires our dealings with other peoples—consider how little effectual protest the churches make against these and many other evils of our time, how no Dante arises to paint the Hell these things denote, and are we not forced to think that the average Christianity of our day has borrowed from commerce its principle of limited liability and declines responsibility for evils so tremendous?

Yet if we cannot throttle these evils they will strangle us. If they be not more effectually dealt with, if some fresh strength of faith and love and righteous indignation do not come upon us, then, notwithstanding our freedom, notwithstanding our wealth, our enormous revenues and mighty armaments, our Empire must crumble to pieces, rotten at the core, and the greatness of England end in an agony of dissolution and decay.

It remains to be seen whether the churches will be equal to this second great service which the world awaits at their hands.

I have spoken of the churches at large, including our own; permit me to add in conclusion a few words about our own little group.

We pride ourselves that in our inherited liberty we have special opportunities. If it be so, and I believe it is, then most assuredly we have also special responsibilities. With those opportunities and responsibilities we have also a special temptation and danger arising out of the very liberty itself. We are too ready to rest in it as a final achievement, to forget that it is but a means to an end. It is a great thing to have inherited the system of free and open trusts. But let us remember that that system is but a means for securing not only free and open minds, but also that we should "think clear, feel deep, bear fruit well," for affording scope and opportunity for our highest thoughts, emotions and ideals. Under the ægis of an open trust we may go backward as well as forward, we may slumber in fancied security, while the evil spirits of sectarianism and finality creep in again to our swept and garnished chambers, bringing others in their train. We are in the main a self-satisfied people, apt to say that we have Abraham to our Father. We do not understand why under our splendid system of liberty we do not more abundantly prosper. May it not be because we have halted at the means and not pushed on to the end; because in achieving our liberty we have forgotten to cultivate sufficiently that feeling of reverence, that sense of personal and national sin, that enthusiasm of love which must ever be the best inspirations of a living church? If we have not these abundantly, our liberty will avail us little, and we shall have to take our place among those Whose trial is done, whose lot is cast,

With those who watch, but work no more,
Who gaze on life, but live no more.

And like Aprile, dying in sorrow,

Leave as we found
The world, we were to loosen, bound.

I would not willingly end on a note of despondency, nor conclude that this fate must necessarily be ours. It need not. We are not so foolish as to hope for an immortality for our special form of religion, our thoughts, our names. If there be life in these then they must die and pass away, die in the sense of developing into new and higher forms. But in such death is neither terror nor shame, for they will have been stepping-stones whereon the world shall rise to higher things.

That in the days to come, when once again the faith in God shines bright and strong, and the dauntless love and purity of Jesus are the inspirations of national and individual life, a nobler, happier race of men may gratefully trace through us some part of their spiritual ancestry—that is still possible if we will be true—that, surely, is the personal hope we may lawfully cherish for our churches in this difficult new time upon which we are entering.

THE STRUGGLE AGAINST CATHOLICISM IN BELGIUM.*

BY THE REV. JAMES HOCART, BRUSSELS.

IN order to present as complete a view of my subject as is consistent with the limits of this short paper, I must state that the struggle against Catholicism is waged in Belgium on three distinct lines—political, philosophical, and religious.

1. The struggle is bound to be first of all political. The Catholic theory claims the subjection of the State to the doctrines and laws of the Church, the State being considered—to use the language of the Vatican Council—as having "no stricter obligation and no more glorious mission than to uphold by all the means in its possession the Church, that pillar of the truth." In a predominantly Catholic country, the ambition of the clergy tends therefore necessarily to the establishment of a really and purely Catholic Government. And such has been from the first and is now the aim of the Belgian clergy. There is no doubt that its ardent participation in the Revolution of 1830 was chiefly inspired by opposition to the Protestantism of the House of Orange and by dread of the possible influence of Dutch Protestant thought upon Belgium. In the first fervour of the revolutionary movement the constitution of the new State was framed in the most liberal spirit; and the Catholic party has never made any attempt towards the repeal of the constitutional liberties: such an attempt would be violently resented by members of moderate or nominal Catholics. Still these liberties, especially since their condemnation by Pius IX. in his "Encyclical and Syllabus of 1864," are looked upon by zealous and believing Catholics as evils, necessary evils however, which have to be tolerated for the present on account of the degeneracy of the times.

Though acknowledging that their ideal of a Catholic state and nation is actually out of their reach, the clergy hope and work for its realisation in the future, and the means on which they rely is the control of the education of the rising generations. Therefore the teaching of religion—i.e., as things stand in Belgium, of Catholicism in public schools—has become the great subject of contention between the Catholics and their opponents of the Liberal, Radical, and Socialist parties. "Let religion be taught in the Church and in the family," say the non-Catholics, "and let the public school be neutral." The effort of the Liberal party to carry out this programme by their law of 1879 was evidently in advance of public opinion, and became one of the chief causes of their overthrow in 1884. Since then the Catholics have been constantly in office, and by successive laws have made the teaching of religion by the clergy obligatory in all primary, secondary, and normal schools. The parents who desire to exempt their children from the religious lesson must tender their request according to a fixed formulary; and it can be easily be understood that parents who are in a dependent position feel obliged to allow their children to attend the religious class against their will rather than draw attention publicly to their dissent from Catholicism. The law also provides that private schools, entirely directed by Catholics and the members of religious orders, may be adopted and subsidised by the communal authorities. It is clear therefore that, in the struggle with regard to the teaching of religion in public schools, Catholicism has had the best of it from 1884 up to the present date.

2. The struggle against Catholicism from a philosophical standpoint cannot be said to be very effective at present—social rather than philosophical questions being in the foreground—nor are its results such as to recommend themselves to the mind of the liberal Christian. This philosophical struggle is carried on in three ways—by University teaching, by Freemasonry, and by Freethinking societies. Of the four Belgian universities, those of Ghent and of Liége are under State control; those of Brussels and of Louvain are independent. There is besides in Brussels an institution called the New University, though not properly a university, but rather a school for the higher study of certain branches of science. The professors at Ghent and Liége being appointed by Government, I am told that the philosophical teaching is very circumspect and very careful not to clash with Catholicism. In Louvain, of course, all the professors are supposed to be docile sons of the Church, though I once met with a doctor who as a man held materialistic views and as a candidate for a professorship at Louvain was an ardent defender of the faith. But naturally whatever they may think in petto, the professors cannot publicly be anything but Catholics. It is therefore only at the University of Brussels and at what is called the New University that, for the time being, there exists a possibility of anti-Catholic philosophical teaching. At the former, for many years the venerable Mr. Tiberghien taught Krause's panentheistic system; but his successors incline to Positivism, and some of the younger professors of science are decidedly materialistic. At the latter, the teaching is entirely positivist.

In the Freemason lodges which are distinctly anti-Catholic and of which there are nineteen in the country, I am informed that the members who still adhere to Theism are a decreasing minority; Positivism and Materialism are in the ascendant. The same may be said of the Freethinking societies, of which there are a certain number, particularly in large towns. Freethinkers in Belgium is generally synonymous with Materialist. The activity of these societies by lectures and publications is not very great at present. One of their principal modes of protestation is the refusal to accept the ministry of the priests at the funerals of their members.

It is much to be regretted that the reaction against Catholicism should carry so many of those who break away from the Church to the extremes of Positivism and Materialism. By its mediæval dogmas and its base superstitions, Romanism is responsible for the excessive rebound. But, on the other hand, this very excess becomes a help to the Church. The clergy constantly point to the fact as a proof that there is no other alternative than Catholicism or infidelity, and cause many of their people who are dissatisfied with much they see and hear to draw the conclusion: better what we have than no religion at all, than no inspiring and uplifting view of life. And therein consists certainly the weakness of philosophy as an opponent of Catholicism in Belgium.

3. It has been the business of others to endeavour to prove that the choice does not lie only between Romanism and Materialism. This brings us to the religious struggle against Catholicism, and at the same time against irreligion. During the last sixty years a great deal of zealous and devoted work has been accomplished in that direction.

Omitting a few Plymouth Brethren, Salvationists and Theosophists, the chief labourers in this field are the two orthodox organisations called the Union of Evangelical Churches and the Belgian Christian Missionary Church. The first numbers 16 churches and 10 mission stations, with 19 pastors and eight evangelists; the total of Church members is not given. The second is more important; it numbers 34 churches and 80 mission station, 35 pastors and three evangelists, 5,993 adult members and 3,280 children. During the last ten years the increase in the numbers of churches has been six, and in the number of adult members 1,076 or 107 a year. The work is done almost exclusively in the Walloon or French-speaking provinces, and among the industrial population. In the Flemish part no success to speak of has been obtained. In contrast to what took place in the sixteenth century, the Flemish population is very much more priest-ridden and hostile to Protestantism than the Walloon.

I have said that orthodox Protestantism is recruited from the working-classes. As a rule, the more cultured people are inaccessible to the orthodox theology. It was, therefore, thought by such men as Edgar Quinet in 1858, and Emile de Laveleye and Count Goblet d'Alviella twenty years later, that perhaps Liberal Christianity would have a better chance with the educated; and as a certain number of gentlemen showed willingness to make the attempt, the present speaker having, through a change of views, resigned a Methodist pulpit, decided in 1881 to devote his strength to the venture. Something has been achieved: a small church has been established in Brussels, with 88 adult members, and a second group of some 40 people has been formed at Ghent. Liberal Christianity has become widely known, it has gained public respect, and obtained legal recognition. But it would be no use denying that we had anticipated far greater results, and had hoped to gather much larger numbers around the standard of Unitarianism. We have been met by great and manifold difficulties — the difficulty of finding suitable halls for our services, financial difficulties, legal difficulties and lawsuits, and, above all, moral and spiritual difficulties.

One of the chief of these last is a too frequent lack of character and courage. Among those who are estranged from Catholicism and adhere to theistic beliefs, many have signified privately their sympathy with our undertaking, but have kept aloof from fear of the great social and political power of the Church. They have counted the cost of a public profession of Liberal Christianity, and have considered it too heavy.

This means, of course, that their religious beliefs and aspirations are weak; that in their hearts there is little faith and more indifference to the higher life. And to complete the picture I must say that widespread indifference is one of the greatest obstacles to any religious progress in the country. On one side we have the faithful and devout Catholics, on the other the determined and outspoken dissenters from Catholicism, Freethinkers and others. And between the two the mass of people who are indifferent to any philosophical opinion or religious belief whatever, and who care only for money, position, or pleasure. Much of this indifference is inside the Church; numbers take too little interest in religion to dream of separating from the Church when so much is to be gained by keeping up an apparent and nominal connection with it. It is very hard to make a breach in this stolid indifference. It is like an earthen rampart into which all shots sink without taking effect.

From all these causes Protestantism has not yet made much headway in the country: a few thousand Protestants of various denominations are but a small minority on a population of six million souls.

I do not perceive any marked symptoms of a progressive religious spirit in Catholicism itself. While in France hundreds of priests have left the Church from conscientious motives during recent years, in Belgium the case of the eminent geologist, Professor Renard, who lately renounced the priesthood, is a solitary exception. There is no more talk of Liberal Catholicism. The progressive members of the Catholic Church have thrown themselves into the social movement, and found an outlet for their activity in Christian Democracy. Meantime, convents are increasing in numbers and in wealth: in the part of Brussels I inhabit and within a short distance, I have seen recently several large and substantial conventual buildings arise. Material and superstitious devotions like those of St. Joseph, of St. Anthony, of the little Jesus of Prague, &c., are flourishing and bringing money in. Making all allowance for examples of real piety, we must say that spiritual religion is at a very low ebb in the Church.

The position of Protestant workers in Belgium is neither easy nor agreeable, confronted as they are by a powerful and superstitious Church, by Positivism Materialism and Indifference. What is their little band against such tremendous hostile forces? But maintaining their faith in God and in Man, they still hope for an awakening in Belgium of the deeper needs of the soul; and they toil on patiently, satisfied if they may be honourably counted among those who by preaching in the wilderness, prepare the way for the future advent of the living Christ.

ARMENIA.

We have almost forgotten the existence of this sorely tried region of the earth in the thrilling and terrible stories of the Soudan, of China, and of South Africa.

But five years ago—what a long five years—the horrors of the awful fate of so many thousands of our fellow-men, sent to death by another Government, filled our hearts and minds with indignation at the crime, and with humiliation at our helplessness in face of it.

The report of the relief of the orphans of these victims of Turkish misrule just issued by Professor J. Rendel Harris and his wife comes to remind us of the fact that the children whom the missionaries and their friends took under their kindly charge, when they were left alone in the world, are still children—a little older, it is true, but requiring care, education, shelter, and subsistence.

It is a pleasant story these few pages have to tell. A photograph at the commencement shows some sixty boys equipped with buckets, brooms and spades, ready "to begin building." Later on we read of the betrothal of one of the older girls to an eligible suitor. The ceremony takes place within the Mission. Flora has apparently been well trained for her future duties. She is still very young according to our Western ideas. "Just entered her seventeenth year. Is good with her needle. Makes all her own garments, and assists in other sewing. She is at present one of the cooks also, and is just now giving much time to that department. She marries quite as well as she would have done had her parents lived, and is probably far ahead of what she would have been intellectually and religiously." So writes the good lady who tells the story.

The girls themselves seem to enjoy their work. Here is an extract from a letter signed by the girls of the Harris Home, Ourfa. (What memories the name suggests! Shall we ever forget the crowded church? Let us turn to a brighter picture.)

Four of us are learning to cook, two each week. We have learned to do some things perfectly, and as soon as we learn to do all kinds of food we will be put to some other work, and four other girls will be put at cooking. Six of us are learning to spin, and six also are learning to wash. All of us, except the little ones, can sew and knit. . . . We make many of our clothes, and hope after a while we can make them all. Some of us also make handkerchiefs.

The boys, too, are making progress; we have already noted the "builders." These are at Marsovan. A letter dated Jan. 25, 1901, says:—"Ice and snow in the streets. Our boys care for roofs this year, and nobody employed for shovelling snow. They are all very good to work."

From Bitlis Mr. Cole writes that "some of the larger boys who have been with us almost four years might have served as village teachers under some supervision this winter, if only conditions in the country had favoured."

Nor are weightier matters neglected. It is eloquent language we read in a letter to "our dear Benefactor" Dr. Barnem, of Harpoot:—

Both we boys and we girls pray in our stammering way to God that you may reach your desirable blessing, all your circumstances may he make worthy you and your comrades, and admit you to the complete happiness of heaven.

What, after all, is our finest eloquence in prayer but just a stammering appeal to the Almighty Father? It is well when we realise it for what it is. Those engaged in this work seem to reap a blessing. Miss Bush, alluded to in previous reports as the "modestly shining" Miss Bush, writes:—"No words can express the comfort we feel in the prayers of these children, and in their safety and happiness—in the thought of their learning of God more and more."

Professor Harris, the "benevolent Professor," as some Armenian correspondents address him, writes in the report that the year has been in the main one of progress, and that the work has not been much interfered with.

In the district of Bitlis, however, there has been constant trouble through the violence of the Kurds, the Turkish authorities being either unable or unwilling to afford protection.

The support of the friends of this movement was asked for and promised for five years, but Professor Harris says that they cannot so exactly limit their help, and pleads for further support to enable the schools and homes to be kept up until the orphans are older, and able to look after themselves. We feel sure the appeal will not be made in vain, and that this eminently satisfactory and Christian duty will not be left undone for want of the necessary funds. Subscriptions and donations will be gladly received by Professor J. Rendel Harris, 5, Park-terrace, Cambridge.

WOMEN'S ARMENIAN RELIEF FUND.

Sir,—I am happy to say that the latest news from Dr. Raynolds, of Van, are more satisfactory than any we have had for some time.

The plentiful harvest of 1900 has raised the general condition of the people as no charity could do; consequently Dr. Raynolds has thought it wise to stop the industrial relief work for widows and girls, which our fund has so long supported. He judged that to continue such help might be a serious disadvantage under the altered conditions of the country, as it would tend to pauperise the people instead of stimulating them to exertion. He has, however, kept a fund in hand for helping necessitous cases.

He pleads, however, eloquently for his orphans and for the continuance of his orphanages, and, to use his own words, begs that "our kind friends who have so long and generously contributed to our needs will turn their attention to the orphanage work, and will furnish the funds which will be needed to carry our present inmates to the point where they can care for themselves, and will provide something for helping them when they go out. I believe that this is the best method of really helping the country; for merely to feed children while they remain in ignorance is a doubtful benefit, but to take the deserving poor children and educate them, and make them into reliable and truly Christian citizens, is to bestow an untold benefit not merely on the children themselves but on the whole community—in short, is the very best means of carrying on missionary work."

The American Mission station seems, indeed, to be the busy centre of all kinds of Evangelistic, educational and spiritual life and work. There are two large day-schools in Van, and the country people are eager to get teachers trained by Dr. Raynolds to open schools in their villages.

Perhaps the most remarkable feature of the last report is that the Armenian ecclesiastics cordially welcome Dr. Raynolds and his coadjutors to their churches, and that co-operative evangelical work is being carried on harmoniously.

Van now boasts a distinct medical department with a hospital and dispensary, &c., and there appears to be a good opening for a physician in the city. Indeed, on every hand there are appeals for more helpers, as well as for apparatus and educational and medical equipments; although the missionaries wisely try to make every branch of their excellent work self-supporting.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

The World.

The author of the following verses had many names as a writer, for when he spoke to children in print, as he often did, he called himself this and that, according to his fancy at the time. But his real name was William Brighty Rands. He was born in Chelsea and died in Dulwich, and all his life was spent in London, where he worked as a clerk and reporter. Sometimes he preached real big sermons to grown-up people, but he was fondest of preaching tiny sermons in magazines to children. Although a mere Londoner, you will see he delighted in the country. But most of all he delighted in the loving hearts and intelligent minds of his many child-hearers. So now for his verses:—

Great, wide, beautiful, wonderful world,
With the wonderful water round you curled,
And the wonderful grass upon your breast—
World, you are beautifully drest.

The wonderful air is over me,
And the wonderful wind is shaking the tree,
It walks on the water, and whirls the mills,
And talks to itself on the top of the hills.

You friendly Earth! how far do you go,
With the wheatfields that nod and the rivers that flow,
With cities and gardens, and cliffs and isles,
And people upon you for thousands of miles?

Ah, you are so great, and I am so small,
I tremble to think of you, World, at all;
But when I had said my prayers to-day,
My mother kissed me, and said, quite gay,—

"If the wonderful world is great to you,
And great to father and mother too,
You are more than the Earth, though you are such a dot;
You can love and think, and the Earth can not."

THE SUPERANNUATION FUND.

IT is with the utmost satisfaction that we call the attention of the members of our churches throughout the country to the report of the meeting held last Tuesday in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, in support of the movement for a Ministers' Superannuation Fund. On June 8 we reported the meeting held at Essex Hall in Whit-week, at which the first public appeal on behalf of the Fund was made by the Committee appointed last year by the National Conference at Leicester to carry out the scheme then adopted; and now comes the good news that half the capital sum of £20,000, which will secure the establishment of the Fund, has already been promised.

The report presented by Mr. COGAN CONWAY to the Leicester Conference, and subsequent statements, have clearly set forth the purpose of the Fund, which is to provide means that shall enable ministers of churches on the roll of our National Conference - to insure to great advantage with the Equitable Life Assurance Society. The proposal in the first instance is that ministers who join the Society should secure an annuity of £52 at the age of sixty-five, and a payment of £250 at death, the Fund providing half of the needed annual premium up to £10. To meet this liability the capital sum of £20,000 is asked for, and, to make assurance doubly sure for the next ten or fifteen years, a further annual subscription list of £300; but if a sufficient endowment fund could be provided it would be eminently desirable that the annuity to be secured should be £104 rather than £52, and the managers of the Fund would be delighted if the possibility of this wider beneficence were put within their power.

As to the great benefit such a Fund would confer upon our ministers, and at the same time upon the congregations they serve, it is not necessary to add a word to what was said at the London and Manchester meetings, and our chief purpose here is to ask attention to those reports and the appeal they make. Mr. CARPENTER, the President of the National Conference, is also Chairman of the Superannuation Fund Committee, and at the Manchester meeting the warmest testimony was borne to the energy and devotion which he and Mr. DAVID MARTINEAU and Mr. CONWAY have thrown into the work. But if any argument were needed to persuade our people that the cause is good, and makes a direct and urgent claim upon their generous support, it would be found in the fact that the first half of the £20,000 needed has been so quickly raised. The President announced at the meeting on Tuesday that the Fund then stood at £10,009, and in the course of the afternoon a further sum of £250 was promised, while annual subscriptions, amounting to £92, had also been promised.

But now the appeal must be made to the whole body of our churches, for, as the President said, we cannot hope that the second £10,000 will be so quickly raised as the first, though we also share his confidence that within the next six months it can be raised. We shall publish next week a full list of the donations already promised, and then it will be still more clearly seen how generous the first response has been. There are, we doubt not, other thousands to be given, and many hundreds, but we are eager also that the Fund should be broad based upon the good-will of our whole people, and that every congregation on the roll of the National Conference should be represented by a number of smaller gifts, while among our ministers there will surely be very many who will wish to respond to Mr. CARPENTER'S appeal, and join in making a ministerial contribution to the Fund. A large proportion of our present ministers will receive no personal benefit from the Fund; but, if we know their heart, they will be among the first who are glad, according to their means, to share in the common act of self-sacrifice in generous giving, which is to confer a great benefit upon their brethren of the present and of coming generations.

The time is ripe for such an appeal, for the proving of our faith, and the demonstration of the power of that common life in our churches, so happily manifested in the spirit of the recent gatherings in Whit-week. When we remember what has been given in the past and what has already been given for this cause, it is impossible to doubt that the hopes of the promoters of the Fund will be fully realised.

The Ministers' Stipend Augmentation Fund, which dates from 1856, had its origin in the generosity of one man, Mr. CHRISTOPHER RAWDON, of Liverpool, and by subsequent gifts has been raised to over £50,000. For the foundation of the Sustentation Fund, the first fruits of the National Conference at Liverpool in 1882, over £20,000 were given. Ten years later the noble buildings of Manchester College were being raised at Oxford, opened in October, 1893, for which over £55,000 were given. More recently two local Funds of over £10,000 each have been raised for church extension by the Manchester district and London; and now again comes an opportunity for our whole people, in the happy fellowship of a common cause, to enjoy the blessedness of giving. The immediate duty seems not difficult: in six months to raise £10,000. A few more substantial contributions and a multitude of humbler gifts, and it is done, to the incalculable benefit of giver and receiver. To this second £10,000, we repeat that we are eager that the good will of our people as a whole should contribute; but, then, as we remember the difference between an annuity of £52 and £104 for the faithful minister at the close of his long years of service, we cannot help wistfully asking whether there may not be among us some friend touched by the Divine grace to realise this need and to claim the great happiness of meeting it by a further noble benefaction. The wealth of CHRISTOPHER RAWDON, after half a century, continues to confer abundant blessing. HENRY TATE'S gift of £10,000 made the beautiful TATE Library in Manchester College possible. And now that the Superannuation Fund is to be established, another such gift might double the benefit that will be conferred.

Of this we dream, knowing what it might be to one who would make such a gift; but the immediate duty we see clearly set before our people, by the end of the year to complete the raising of the first £20,000 and the subscription list of £300, and so to secure the ample beginning of this good work.

THE Education Bill (No. 2) is now before the House of Commons, and appears to be intended to pass. But similar intentions with respect to Bill No. 1, and its celebrated predecessor in the last Parliament were unavailing, and we could wish no better fate for the present Bill than that it should be dropped in favour of Sir John Brunner's, which would simply give leave to continue the work declared illegal under the Cockerton judgment, till a serious consideration of our whole educational system can be undertaken by Parliament.

CARMARTHEN COLLEGE.—The proceedings connected with the closing of the session at this College took place last week, under the direction of a deputation from the Presbyterian Board, consisting of the Revs. G. D. Hicks and R. H. U. Bloor, and Messrs. H. Baily, G. H. Clennell, and F. Preston. Our extended report is inevitably postponed.

MINISTERS' SUPERANNUATION FUND.

A meeting was held in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on Tuesday afternoon, July 2, in support of the Ministers' Superannuation Fund, which is being raised by the special committee appointed for that purpose by the National Conference at the Leicester Meeting last year. We recently reported the meeting held at Essex Hall on May 28, when the first public appeal was made on behalf of the Fund, and the nature of the scheme was fully explained.

The chair was taken by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, President of the Conference, and there were also present Messrs. David Martineau, William Long, J. R. Beard, H. P. Greg, F. Monks, F. W. Monks, T. Harwood, John Hudson, Harold Carpenter, J. Fretwell, Mr. and Mrs. Thos. Worthington, Mr. and Mrs. G. W. R. Wood, the Revs. S. A. Steinthal, H. E. Dowson, D. Agate, W. E. Atack, E. P. Barrow, J. M. Bass, B. C. Constable, V. D. Davis, W. C. Hall, R. T. Herford, W. Mason, J. Moore, J. C. Odgers, G. A. Payne, C. Peach, J. A. Pearson, P. Prime, W. Reynolds, C. Roper, T. Robinson, W. R. Shanks, E. L. H. Thomas, Jenkin Thomas, W. L. Tucker, and J. H. Wicksteed.

The Chairman said that he had received a number of letters of regret from friends warmly interested in the Fund, but unable to be present, including Messrs. David Ainsworth and H. Chatfeild Clarke, the treasurers of the Fund, Mr. Cogan Conway, the secretary, who was detained by an important meeting of the Southern Association, the Rev. Dr. Vance Smith, Mr. Frank Taylor, President of the Ministers' Stipend Augmentation Fund, the Rev. C. T. Poynting, President of the Provincial Assembly, Mr. S. B. Worthington, and Mr. Harry Rawson, who was to have moved the resolution in support of the Fund, but was kept at home by a cold.

Mr. Rawson, having expressed his great regret at being prevented from taking part in the meeting, wrote as follows:—

It is not with me a new thing to feel interested in anything that concerns the personal welfare of our ministers. Through my long connection with both the Augmentation and the Sustentation Funds, and the knowledge thus acquired of their circumstances, I am convinced that, in the great majority of cases, they are entirely unable to make anything like an adequate provision for old age and its infirmities.

A little over twenty years ago I was entrusted (a confidence I can never forget) with frank replies to inquiries I had addressed to 260 ministers, with particulars of their income from professional labours. They were embodied in a paper on Ministers' Stipends, which was presented to the National Conference held in Liverpool in 1882. Those returns I have carefully preserved under seal. I have not destroyed them, from the feeling that if they should meet the eye of a future generation, they will form an illustration, at once authentic and unique, of the estimated value of ministerial service at the latter end of the nineteenth century. If I could only find the requisite time, I should like now to institute another inquiry on the same lines. But the result, I greatly fear, would be to show a somewhat lower average of stipend than that which, when formerly revealed, led to the establishment of the Sustentation Fund. It will be a fitting and a graceful supplement to former efforts, if the proposal now made should meet with wide and generous support, and our ministers should be assisted to prepare for the inevitable day when, through advanced age and its infirmities, retirement and rest have become both well earned and absolutely necessary.

Nor can it fail to prove of material advantage to our congregations that, under these conditions, whilst regretfully parting from good and faithful pastors, they will feel more at liberty to avail themselves of the abilities and energy of younger men.

I earnestly hope that the scheme will receive the sympathetic approval of the meeting. We are largely indebted for its origination to Mr. Cogan Conway and other friends; to the National Conference at Leicester for its formal recommendation and presentment to our people; and to the Rev. J. E. Carpenter, for his zealous and influential support.

My engagements, already sufficient for my strength, forbid me to offer any personal service to this movement; but as a slight indication of my desire for its early and complete success, I have already asked Mr. Carpenter to put me down in his list as a donor of £20.

The Rev. L. P. Jacks, Chairman of the Board of Directors of the Ministers' Benevolent Society, who had been preaching in the district, but was obliged to return to Birmingham before the meeting, also wrote, expressing his regret, and said:—

I should have been very glad to have an opportunity of addressing your meeting, were it only for the purpose of contradicting a rumour which has gone abroad to the effect that the Ministers' Benevolent Society had turned a cold shoulder to the scheme you are preparing. The truth is the precise opposite. I have no official mandate to speak, but I do not hesitate to say that our Board, both individually and collectively, will rejoice if, as I hope, your efforts are crowned by a splendid success.

Your object and ours are analogous but different.

We hink that the wants of some ministers will be better met under the methods you are proposing, while there are other wants to which our procedure seems better adapted. Perhaps the two types of requirement will be more completely met by two institutions dealing with them separately than by one institution dealing with them together. At all events I see no reason why our interests should clash, or why in our operations we should get in one another's way.

The Chairman then made a statement as to the position and intention of the Fund, again emphasising the chief points, which he explained at the London meeting, as reported in these columns. They were asking for a capital sum of not less than £20,000, the interest of which was to provide half the premiums to be paid by ministers availing themselves of the benefits of the Society, to insure in the Equitable Life Assurance Society for an annuity of £52 at the age of sixty-five. Members would also have the opportunity of securing the sum of £250 at death. The Equitable Society had been chosen after long and careful inquiries and with the approval of high expert opinion, which had been obtained. Further to secure their position, they were also asking for an annual subscription list of about £300, and then they felt they could face all claims that might be made upon the Fund for the next ten or fifteen years; and for further extension in the future he shared entirely the confidence expressed by Mr. David Martineau and Sir John Brunner, that the laity of the next generation would be no less generous than the laity of the present day in providing for the needs of their ministers.

He had been astonished at the response already made to their appeal. Five weeks ago they asked for the £20,000, and during the first week Mr. Frederick Nettlefold started the Fund with a promise of £1,000 on condition that the whole amount was raised. Mr. W. Colfox, the President of Manchester College, had made a similar promise, and others had given in the same spirit, so that at the time of that meeting half of the Fund had been raised, the promises amounting to £10,009; and annual subscriptions up to £92 had also been promised. Would it not then be possible to raise the other £10,000 during the next six months? He knew that it would not come in so rapidly as the first; but when once the appeal was fully laid before their people he was sure that they would respond.

And in view of the generosity of the laity, he offered to his brother ministers the suggestion that they also should participate in raising the Fund, and that in ways hereafter to be suggested they should invite the sympathy and active co-operation of their congregations. He felt it right to plead with his brethren that they should make their own sacrifices, in the same way that he asked it of the laity, in making this effort. One aged minister had already asked, writing with trembling hand, whether so small an offering as 5s. might be accepted. That was the amount he had thought might be asked of all their ministers; their gifts already promised ranged from 5s. to £10.

Mr. David Martineau, in supplementing the Chairman's statement, said he was very glad to hear the letter from the Chairman of the Ministers' Benevolent Society. He was inclined to think it was better on the whole to have the two Funds separate, and they need not clash at all. A young minister who joined the new Society would do well to subscribe also to the Ministers' Benevolent, which involved, he understood, only a subscription of £1 for twenty-one years, with a confident expectation of benefit in case of need. He had been asked at Leicester whether there would be anything dishonourable in a minister who belonged to either of the older Funds joining the new Society. There could be no such suggestion. It was merely a matter of payment. If a minister could afford to secure the additional benefit, he ought to do so. The response to their appeal had been very gratifying, and he confidently hoped that they would be able to begin work in January, 1903.

Mr. William Long, President of the Sustentation Fund, then moved:—

That this meeting, believing that the establishment of a Ministers' Superannuation Fund will prove of the utmost importance to the welfare of both ministers and congregations, earnestly commends to the churches constituting the National Conference, the scheme presented by the Conference Committee on the basis adopted at Leicester, April, 1900.

He was very sorry that Mr. Rawson could not be present to move that resolution as had been intended. Like Mr. Rawson, he had had a good deal to do with two other Funds which had done much to help ministers to keep the wolf from the door; but while they distributed something like £3,000 annually in grants they could not do what the new Fund aimed at. It would call upon ministers for a certain amount of self-denial, and then would give them a right to its benefits. He could not think that the laity would be lacking in this matter, or that the Fund would stand at £20,000. When they saw the large amounts their Nonconformist brethren were raising for New Century Funds, it should stimulate them once for all to raise their Fund to such proportions that it would not be in need of further help.

The Rev. S. A. Steinthal, President of the Widows' Fund, in seconding the resolution, expressed his high appreciation of the work done by the Ministers' Benevolent, and pointed out the difference between its aims and that of the insurance they proposed through the new Fund. He strongly supported the Chairman's appeal to ministers to take a part in raising the needed Fund, by gifts, if of only a small amount. There could be no doubt that the Fund would be of great benefit to congregations as well as ministers, in cases were aged and beloved ministers, conscious that their strength was no longer equal to the work, were yet unable from lack of means to retire, and congregations could not incur the pain of suggesting a change. He trusted that the movement would receive the most generous support. They owed a deep debt of gratitude to the Chairman, to Mr. David Martineau, and Mr. Cogan Conway, for the energy and devotion they had displayed in that matter.

Mr. F. Monks, while approving of the objects of the Fund, asked whether the Committee had fully considered the two-fold character of their aim, to secure an annuity and also a benefit at death. He thought the annuity the most important, and that it might be better to keep that separate from the other aim. He also thought £52 was not enough, and that an annuity of at least £102 should be secured.

The Chairman explained that all members would secure the annuity, and quite agreed that £104 would be better than the smaller sum, and members would be able to secure double benefits by additional payment, provided the Fund allowed of such extension.

Mr. James Beard and the Rev. H. E. Dowson also spoke warmly in support of the resolution, and various questions were asked and answered.

The Chairman explained that a trust had not yet been created, because they thought they must first see whether the Fund would be raised; but now that such progress had been made, it would be their duty as soon as possible to frame a trust, the terms of which would of course be submitted to a general meeting of the subscribers.

The resolution having been unanimously adopted, a vote of thanks to the Trustees of the Memorial Hall for the use of the hall, proposed by the Chairman, and a vote of thanks to the Chairman, proposed by Mr. W. Long, and carried by acclamation, brought the meeting to a close.

Country Holiday Movement.—Miss A. Lawrence, 23, Campden House-chambers, Campden-hill, London, W., begs to acknowledge, with many thanks, receipt for this fund of the following sums:—Mr. Bond, 10s.; the Rev. R. B. Drummond, £1; Mr. J. R. Gimson, £1 1s.; Mrs. Boys, 10s.; the Misses Boys, £1; Miss Crowe, 5s.; also a parcel of clothing from Mrs. Arthur Sharpe.

UNITARIANS AND THE WAR.

MEETING IN MANCHESTER.

A special meeting of the Provincial Assembly of Presbyterian and Unitarian Congregations of Lancashire and Cheshire was held in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on June 27. The chair was taken by the Rev. C. T. Poynting, the president, and there was a large attendance. The object of the meeting was to consider the South African war. Voting was confined to ministers and delegates on the roll, but all members of congregations on the roll had the right of moving or seconding resolutions or speaking on questions under discussion. The Rev. S. A. Steinthal conducted a short religious service. One of the secretaries (the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson) read a number of letters from ministers and delegates who were unable to be present, all of which, with one exception, expressed sympathy with the resolution of which notice had been given.

The President said whatever our opinions were as to the origin of the war, what we beheld now was a contest in which some of the gravest problems of our social well-being were at issue. All members of that Assembly were at one in this—that it was the duty of that body to maintain civil and religious liberty all the world over. But when they came to consider the actual means by which that liberty was to be secured they differed, and rightly differed; and then came the need for absolute courtesy and mutual forbearance. Difficult as it was to understand for each and all of us, yet as a matter of fact there were those, whose moral and spiritual character and whose intellectual abilities stood on a far higher level than our own individually, who took a view diametrically opposed to that which we individually took. Therefore we had to concede that it was no moral perversity, no ignoble conceit or intellectual blindness which made men and women unable to look at the questions involved from one point of view. Let them remember that they were all of them friends, all fellow-members of the Free Church, bound together in the same sacred ties, and while they spoke with perfect loyalty for truth, for liberty, and for religion, let them also speak with perfect love for the neighbour, the neighbour who might not hold the same views as themselves, but who yet was to be loved as themselves. Let them speak the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, but let them see to it that no heart should be pained, no temper aroused, no self-respect wounded by what they might feel it their solemn duty to declare.

Mr. R. Robinson (Liverpool) moved the following resolution, of which he had given notice:—

That this Assembly protests against the policy of His Majesty's Government in regard to the war in South Africa during the last twelve months; deplores the fact that no attempt to offer acceptable terms of peace was made when the military supremacy of this country was made apparent; and expresses its emphatic condemnation of the burning of farms and destruction of industrial property and the treatment of the women and children in the so-called refugee camps; and declares that forcibly to deprive a community of self-government is a flagrant breach of the moral law which is binding upon nations as well as upon individuals.

Mr. Robinson said that at no time in the history of the last hundred years had civil liberty been in such peril as it was in to-day. The resolution was limited in respect to time and subject. It was the moral issues which it raised; and the importance of those moral issues dwarfed all questions of interest and finance, important as these might be. There had been at least two opportunities within the last year of making peace. The first was in June, 1900, when an armistice was agreed upon between General Buller and General Botha, but that opportunity was rejected when Lord Roberts declared that his terms were unconditional surrender. Then there were the negotiations between Lord Kitchener and General Botha, which were brought to nothing by the alterations which the home Government made in Lord Kitchener's proposals. It was a terrible responsibility and a terrible offence against the moral principles which ought to govern us all to refuse to take opportunities of making peace. Even supposing that peace did ultimately come by our wearing down the Boers to unconditional surrender, the very concessions suggested by Lord Kitchener and General Buller must be granted to constitutional agitation in South Africa and here. It was absurd to suppose that the Boers could be refused the elementary rights of free citizens for any length of time. Passing to the burning of farms, Mr. Robinson said it was not a military matter only, for the civil authorities had been consulted about it, and Lord Milner had foreshadowed the farm-burning in September last. The Conference at The Hague had declared emphatically only a year before that private property should not be confiscated, and pillage was formally prohibited. What were we to say of the conduct of those who had solemnly set their signature to this treaty and then a year later sanctioned, if they did not order, the proceedings in South Africa of which we had heard so much? Of what value was a treaty or a solemn engagement between nations if it was to be broken so easily? Mr. Robinson quoted passages from the narratives of Miss Hobhouse and Mr. Joshua Rowntree in regard to the concentration camps, and from Lady Maxwell's appeal to America, to show that the women and children of the Boers are suffering severe hardships. The concentration camps had been made necessary by the destruction of the farms and the means of subsistence, which itself was a consequence of the rapid advance of Lord Roberts from Bloemfontein, which left vast tracts of country unoccupied. Coming to the last clause of the resolution, Mr. Robinson said the right of self-government was one which was dear to us, and for which we were prepared to make any sacrifice. We were bound to allow the same right to other people, and it would be a moral offence against the laws of God if we tried to govern the Dutch in South Africa by force. If we put such a fetter upon a free people it would become the means of the downfall of the liberty which we ourselves enjoyed.

The Rev. C. J. Street (Bolton) seconded the resolution. He pointed out that no churches were committed in any way by what their ministers or delegates did there. Speaking to the resolution, Mr. Street said never had there been in history a war conducted on the lines on which the present war was being conducted. Everything that was dignified about war seemed to have been dissipated in the last year. If we had been acting in a civilised way or if we had been fighting one of the countries of Europe we should have offered reasonable terms when we seized Bloemfontein and Pretoria. Farm-burning was justifiable as a punishment for treachery, but if, as he feared had been the case, it was done in wantonness and vindictiveness and to bring brave men to their knees it was wicked and abominable. If we did not protest against this we must share the awful responsibility. It was heartbreaking to read the narratives of Miss Hobhouse and Mr. Rowntree. The women and children in the camps were not refugees but prisoners taken there by military force, and in many instances the women were separated from their children. He did not think there was a man in that room who would not do what the Boers were doing now under similar circumstances. The past could not be undone, but generous treatment of the Boers would help us in the future. Every nation in the world but Great Britain was honouring the Boers, and we should honour them also if they lived in Finland and were being treated by Russia as we were treating them. For himself and his friends he repudiated the title of "pro-Boers"; they claimed to be standing for the best interests of their own country.

The Rev. WALTER REYNOLDS asked leave to move an amendment expressing regret at the obstinacy of the Boer oligarchy on the Continent, who, having fled from the war and escaped its worst evils, yet urged the suffering combatants to keep up the hopeless struggle, which could only cause further destruction of property and life whilst postponing the establishment of that form of colonial government which had secured in Canada, Australia, New Zealand, Natal, and Cape Colony the largest amount of liberty, and had exemplified the best and most enlightened government in the world.

The PRESIDENT ruled the amendment out of order, but told Mr. Reynolds he could move it as a resolution when the first resolution had been disposed of.

Mr. REYNOLDS then spoke in opposition to the resolution. He was several times called to order. The pro-Boers, he said, asked England to tie her hands and to leave the Boers free. He was not anti-Boer, but he was strongly anti-Kruger. We had been twice as good to the concentration camps as to the camps of the Outlanders, who were our own countrymen. The concentration camps were an attempt to mitigate the horrors of war, and he believed that after the war, when we gave them liberty and good government, the Boers would be our friends.

Mr. E. C. HARDING asked was it not a mockery that people in our churches should pray to be delivered from "battle, murder and sudden death," and yet raise no voice to stop all the calamities which were being inflicted in the name and by the Government of England—England that had wept over the partition of Poland, that had helped weaker nations to obtain their freedom, that had freed the slaves, and that had been the refuge of the oppressed and the downtrodden?

The Rev. E. W. LUMMIS moved the following amendment:—

That this Assembly expresses its emphatic condemnation of the treatment of women and children in the concentration camps in South Africa and of the wanton burning of farms and destruction of industrial property in war beyond what is absolutely required by military exigencies, deplores the fact that no successful attempt to conclude peace with our brave opponents had yet been made, and expresses the earnest hope that every effort will be used by His Majesty's Government to bring the war to a speedy end and to establish at the earliest possible moment a liberal form of self-government in the annexed territories.

The object of the amendment was to remove from the resolution any colour of partisanship.

Mr. J. TAYLOR seconded the amendment, and said he and his brother had lived amongst the Dutch for twenty years and had suffered all the disabilities complained of in the Transvaal. But all the questions between the Boers and the Outlanders were political questions, and the Outlanders would have got the reforms they desired quite as soon as the English people had gained the Reform Act of 1832. The Boers had been born in the traditions of freedom, and they would never give in.

Mr. E. POWELL (Chester) refused to accept annexation of the Transvaal and the Orange Free State as an accomplished fact until it was put beyond the possibility of doubt by the concurrence of the people chiefly concerned. The women and children were in the concentration camps not as refugees but as prisoners. The death-rate in one camp had been at the rate of 435 per thousand per annum. A death-rate of 200 per thousand per annum in the worst slums of the worst cities of England would represent an epidemic of such virulence as we never encountered except in plagues and dreadful visitations. He declined to be cool under such conditions, and he entirely declined to accept Mr. Lummis's amendment. We had had a complete and crushing exposure of the mendacity of certain public men in this country who pretended that we were doing in South Africa what Sherman had done in the American Civil War. He had gone to live, only two years after the war, in one of the cities through which Sherman's troops had passed, and if anyone told him that Sherman attempted in the State of Georgia and the south-western section of Tennessee anything that we had done in South Africa, it could be proved to be historically false by ten thousand witnesses.

The "previous question" was moved by Mr. BRADSHAW (Bolton) and seconded by Rev. W. REYNOLDS, but it was rejected. The amendment was withdrawn and the resolution was carried in the following amended terms:—

That this Assembly, having regard to the policy of His Majesty's Government in respect to the war in South Africa during the last twelve months, deplores the fact that no acceptable terms of peace were offered by them when the military supremacy of this country was made apparent; expresses its emphatic condemnation of the burning of farms and destruction of industrial property, and the treatment of the women and children in the concentration camps; and declares that any terms of peace which do not include the offer of self-government are a flagrant breach of the moral law which is binding upon nations as well as upon individuals.

There were present thirty-five ministers and twenty-eight delegates, and only two persons voted against the resolution.

On the proposition of Mr. H. GREG, seconded by the Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL, copies of the resolution were ordered to be sent to Lord Salisbury, Mr. Chamberlain, Mr. Balfour, Mr. Brodrick, and Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman.

The proceedings closed with a vote of thanks to the President.

THE ORIGINS OF CHRISTIAN DISCIPLESHIP.
